“To provide for us in our necessities is not in the power of Government. It would be a vain presumption in statesmen to think they can do it. The people maintain them, and not they the people. It is in the power of Government to prevent much evil ; it can do very little positive good in this, or perhaps in anything else. It is not only so of the State and statesman, but of all the classes and descriptions of the rich ; they are the pensioners of the poor, and are maintained by their superfluity. They are under an absolute, hereditary, and indefeasible dependence on those who labour, and are miscalled the poor.”—EDMUND BURKE.

THE POOR LAW.

CHAPTER I.

POOR LAW PRINCIPLES.

LEGAL provision for the relief of the destitute is not, like other national institutions, — for instance, Parliament, courts of justice, or a standing army, — a plain and necessary part of civilised social organisation, requiring no explanation and needing no defence. On the contrary, such provision would seem at first sight artificial and even unnatural, for it establishes a state of things in which persons are not obliged, unless they choose, to provide themselves with the means of subsistence; while those who work for their own living are compelled, whether they like it or not, to maintain those who will not or cannot support themselves. Hence it is always found necessary, in treating of this subject, to begin by showing why there ought to be and in point of fact must be a Poor Law before we can discuss profitably what Poor Laws ought to be, or describe what they have been. We have, therefore, no choice but to ask the reader's attention to the reasons that have impelled civilized societies to provide for the relief of destitution at the public cost, in order that he may the better understand the past history and present arrangements of the Poor Law in his own country.

Even the word "poor" requires explanation. It is used to describe two different, though allied, classes of persons,—first, those who are actually destitute; second, those who would be destitute but for that manual labour which constitutes their "property," and is the chief source of the wealth of mankind. This is what Burke alludes to in the motto prefixed to this book, when he speaks of the labouring class as being "miscalled the poor." Elsewhere the same writer, who never touched upon any subject that he did not adorn with wise thought and noble feeling, and who has done far more than any other man to define and fix the principles of the English Constitution, exclaims, "We have heard many plans for the relief of the labouring poor. This puling jargon is not as innocent as it is foolish. Hitherto the name of poor (in the sense in which it is used to excite compassion) has not been used for those who can but for those who cannot labour—for the sick and infirm, for orphan infancy, for languishing and decrepit age; but when we affect to pity, as poor, those who must labour or the world cannot exist, we are trifling with the condition of mankind. . . . I do not call a healthy young man, cheerful in his mind and vigorous in his arms,—I cannot call such a man poor; I cannot pity my kind as a kind, merely because they are men. . . ."—(Third Letter on a Regicide Peace).

The same distinction is drawn in the Report of the Commissioners in 1834 (page 227); but, rather unfortunately, the word "poor" is there used in the sense which Burke deprecated. Thus "the state of a person unable to labour, or unable to obtain in return for his labour the means of subsistence" is called "Indigence," and "Poverty" is used to describe "the state of one who, in order to obtain a mere subsistence, is forced to have recourse to labour." In the Edinburgh Review for July 1836, the practical evils that resulted from this ambiguity in the use of the word "poor" are very forcibly pointed out, and the practical conclusion thus summed up:—"Indigence may be provided for, mendicity may be extirpated, but all attempts to extirpate poverty can have no effects but bad ones." In the present treatise, therefore, the word will not be used; but words such as indigence, destitution, and the like, will be applied to one class, and the other will be described by the more fitting title of labouring or working people.

There is another popular misapprehension, which, though exposed nearly fifty years ago, still does something more than linger on, even in quarters where more accurate information might be looked for. Noticing the results of the investigation into foreign systems of Poor Law made in 1834, the Quarterly Review writes, "We believe that the general impression, till very lately, has been that England stands alone among nations in the provision which her laws have made against destitution. Certainly those who questioned the policy of this institution have continually inveighed against it as one of an extraordinary and unexampled nature; while its advocates have appeared to shrink from supporting their views, as they might have done, by a reference to the fact that its principle has long since been adopted by all really civilized communities." Although this investigation was repeated upon a most extensive scale in 1874, and its results embodied in a volume which is the authority for all statements concerning foreign Poor Laws contained in this treatise, it is very doubtful whether the public mind is at all disabused of the mistake. The existence of pauperism in England is still very frequently set down to some national peculiarity, whether for evil or good, according to the taste of the writer, such as our system of land laws, or our superiority in the virtue of social benevolence. No doubt, in the English Poor Law, as in other national institutions, there are some very strongly defined characteristics, most of which, it may be here said, redound to our credit as compared with other countries rather than the reverse. But the fact is that in all civilized countries the same kind of difficulties concerning the support of the indigent have been encountered, the same sort of remedies been tried, and the same experiences, mostly of a painful and disappointing character, been gone through. Two or three facts in proof of this may be adduced. Belgium has been called upon good authority the "classic land of Pauperism." In France the immediate result of the Revolution of 1789 was to substitute for the system of public benevolence then existing a system of support founded upon legal rights, which, however, only lasted four or five years. Holland has tried the latest and perhaps the most advanced experiment in Poor Law legislation no longer ago than 1870. Finally, there are elaborate systems of poor relief in the United States, with the result that in the typical State of Massachusetts the amount of pauperism was recently calculated at considerably more than one half of that existing in England.¹

What, then, is the "principle" that makes the institution of Poor Laws a necessary part of social organisation? Out of many answers that have been given to this question there are two which, though inadequate, have played so important a part in the history of Poor Law, and have given rise to so much interesting discussion, that they cannot be passed over in silence. They may be called the "sentimental" and "utilitarian" reasons respectively: the first, that all men have a natural right to the means of existence; the second, that society is compelled, in the interests of its own self-preservation, to take some care of destitute persons. Both these propositions are, in a certain sense, true, though not so as to answer the question before us.

The first or sentimental reason is expressed in such phrases as the following:—"The right of every peaceful and obedient member of society to the means of subsistence;" or, "It is an admitted maxim of social polity that the first charge on land must always be the maintenance of the people reared upon it. This is the principle of the English Poor Law" (Nicholls's History of the Poor Law, vol. i. p. 2). This last opinion is very commonly held and positively affirmed, but to estimate its true value we have but to remember that no man from the moment of his birth can enforce any claim to any "rights" except what some one or other, or society itself, chooses to allow him; and, again, that if we start from the rights of individuals, it is impossible to draw a line between things which are and things which are not "natural" rights. But it is more to the purpose to point out that this so-called right has been peremptorily denied, and the denial even erected into a maxim of State policy. Thus it has been said, "There is no danger of which foreign legislation" (the allusion is more especially to France) "appears to be more apprehensive than the recognition of any right of working men to be relieved, or even to have work found for them when destitute. They are relieved, but always with the reservation that such aid is given not of right but of charity" (Doyle, p. 6). And M. Thiers has further laid down the principle "that when the virtue of charity ceases to be private, and becomes collective, it is essential that it should preserve its character of a virtue,—that is to say, that it should remain voluntary and spontaneous; for otherwise it would cease to be a virtue, and would become a dangerous compulsion." On the other hand, the necessity of some provision for relief of indigence is so manifest that one French minister enunciated the proposition "that no one has a right to public relief, but that the bestowal of such relief is a duty incumbent on the State." This, which the author of the report calls a somewhat "illogical statement of the case," nevertheless approximates, as we shall see, closely to the true principle of Poor Laws.—(Report of the Relief of the Poor in France, by E. Lee Hamilton, p. 136.)

It may be interesting to note the different positions which various nations have taken up in respect of the "right" to maintenance. Sweden in 1870, Denmark in 1866, re-enacting a law of 1683, and Prussia in 1871, have expressly conferred upon all destitute persons the right to such relief as is necessary. Holland in 1870 framed a new Poor Law, in which it was expressly laid down that "no person has a right to relief, and that the care of the poor is a moral not a civil duty; that the exercise of charity should be relegated to the Church or to private charity; but that where these agencies do not exist it may become necessary for the State to intervene in the interests of public decency and order," which is only arriving at the same point by a different way. France in 1793 formally declared that the relief of the destitute was a national debt, but retraced her steps five years later from experience of the evils entailed,—a measure which included Belgium also. England, followed in this by the United States, occupies an intermediate and, it would seem, more intelligible position. Nothing is said about the rights of persons to receive relief, but the duty is cast upon localities to see that no person perishes for want of the means of existence. There is, therefore, no right that can be enforced by legal process; but Lord Chief-Justice Cockburn laid it down that there ought to be some remedy if a destitute person is refused relief, either by indictment, or, preferably, by mandamus (Glen, Poor Law Orders, p. 62). The same rule appears to obtain in Austria and some German States, an appeal being allowed to a higher authority than the parish in at least one State (Baden). It may be adduced as a curious proof how practically the most extreme theories end in the same results, that in Holland, until the year 1854, liability to repayment of relief might be enforced against charitable institutions, the point having been decided against them in several instances.—(Sendall, p. 20.)

The plain truth is, that theories which start from the rights or status of individuals lead us at last nowhere in determining the principles upon which societies must and ought to act. We have only to push the theory to its extreme limits and see what we should come to. Thus an Englishman might very fairly urge that the want of any recognised title to relief would, under certain circumstances, produce a Revolution, and that, as a matter of fact, the French Revolution was largely caused by the existence of indigence driven to despair by the hopelessness of relief. And a Frenchman might, with equal justice, retort that the bestowal of a legal right to relief would, under certain circumstances, lead to practical Communism, as it had done in England at the time of the Poor Law Reform of 1834.

The second or utilitarian principle has been stated in its naked and somewhat revolting common sense as follows:—"Whenever, for the purposes of Government, we arrive in any state of society at a class so miserable as to be in want of the common necessities of life, a new principle comes into action. The usual restraints, which are sufficient for the well-fed, are often useless in checking the demands of hungry stomachs. Hence . . . it may be expedient, in a merely economical point of view, to supply gratuitously the wants of even able-bodied persons, if it can be done without creating crowds of additional applicants."—(Babbage, Principles of Taxation, quoted by Nicholls.)

Now this statement contains two undeniable and important truths. It declares that the good of the community, and not the rights of individuals, is the legitimate cause of legal provision for destitution, and it pays regard to the fact that in all countries Poor Law legislation has been devised to meet certain plain and growing evils that were endangering the social fabric. Its error is that it overlooks these moral or humanitarian considerations which are just as necessary to the well-being of society as material or economical conditions, and which would compel the establishment of a system of State relief even could it be shown that as a matter of policy or of economy no such relief was needed. And by separating off the indigent class from the rest of society, it lays itself open to the retort that Poor Laws, so far from being capable of being defended on grounds of general expediency, have always been instituted in the selfish interests of privileged classes. The opinion is attributed to Mr. Nassau Senior that they "originated in ignorance, selfishness, and pride, and in an attempt substantially to restore the expiring system of slavery." Others have expressed the same idea by ascribing Poor Laws to the survival of Feudalism—that is, to the policy which separates the labouring classes from ownership of the land. And finally, the expediency of State relief in the interests of the working people themselves is thus seriously challenged by so eminent an authority as Mr. Malthus:—"I feel persuaded that if Poor Laws had never existed in this country, though there might have been a few more instances of very severe distress, the aggregate mass of happiness among the common people would have been much greater than at present." He ascribes their "tendency to depress the condition of the 'poor'" to four causes,—“the impulse they give to the increase of population without increasing the supply of food,” the consumption of food in workhouses by non-workers, the artificial rise in the price of provisions, together with the lowering of the price of labour, so that

This brief survey of the curiously different points of view from which the provision of State relief has been regarded by leading authorities will enable the reader to compare the various opinions that have been held respecting it, and also to apprehend the general principle which, as being common to all theories concerning it, may be assigned as the actual cause of Poor Law legislation. For all are agreed, whatever may be the reason they give for their conclusion, that indigence must be relieved by some one or other, and at the cost of the community, by whatever name we choose to call the process by which the relief is conveyed. This law or fact we may express in the following terms:—That every society upon arriving at a certain stage of civilization finds it positively necessary for its own sake,—that is to say, for the satisfaction of its own humanity, and for the due performance of the purposes for which societies exist,—to provide that no person, no matter what has been his life, or what may be the consequences, shall perish for want of the bare necessities of existence. Even if history did not make it plain to us, as we shall see when we come to treat of the origin of Poor Law in England, that this was the simple matter of fact principle which gave rise to the institution of State relief, a very slight consideration of what is involved in the idea of a society would teach us that in the higher and more delicate types of social organization, what we might call the moral life of the community is incompatible with the spectacle of unrelieved indigence connived at by the comfortable and prosperous classes. It is precisely the “few more cases of very severe distress," the possibility of which Mr. Malthus admits, that people feel must be dealt with somehow, and that so as to give a reasonable certainty that there will be nothing to shock our natural feelings of humanity and kindness. How can men enjoy life with the knowledge that their neighbours are starving? Or how can a State call upon its citizens to fight for their country, or to tax themselves for such objects as government, justice, religion, if all these, which are the moral glory of mankind, do not avail to prevent other citizens from dying in the agonies of cold and hunger? Of nations, as of men, it may be truly said, that if they have not charity they are nothing.

The actual condition of things out of which this feeling of humanity struggled into existence was the embarrassment men felt in punishing (with frightful penalties) vagrancy and mendicancy, or even crime itself, without affording some assurance that the bodily wants which drive persons to these courses were not altogether unprovided for at the public cost. Moreover, as the social conscience became more mature, there arose a dim and indistinct feeling that pauperism and crime were due to inherited conditions of moral and physical evil, for which paupers and criminals were in no sense responsible, but which had to a large extent grown out of the selfish neglect or mischievous ignorance of the nation itself in previous ages. Who, for instance, that has ever realised the injuries which the labouring classes have endured from State interference with their work and wages, or from State non-interference with their dwellings and surroundings, could, with any peace of conscience, leave those unhappy persons upon whom the curse has fallen to perish in want, disease, or ignorance? The thing is impossible, and because it was found to be impossible, therefore,—apart from all theories and independently of all results,—the public relief of destitution, together with laws for its administration, became a recognised part of the duties undertaken by civilized States.

This reference to the natural operation of humanity, as a thing due from society to its own self-respect, is to be found virtually in all the reasons which legislators or writers have assigned as being the principle of Poor Law administration in their respective countries.¹ We shall, however, content ourselves with adducing the authority of Mr. J. S. Mill, whose account of the matter is in agreement with what has been stated above, and will probably, from its directness and simplicity, commend itself to the reader as a satisfactory statement of the facts of the case:—"Apart from any metaphysical considerations respecting the foundation of morals, or of the social union, it will be admitted to be right that human beings should help one another, and the more so in proportion to the urgency of the need; and none needs help so urgently as one who is starving. The claim to help, therefore, created by destitution is one of the strongest which can exist, and there is prima facie the amplest reason for making the relief of so extreme an exigency as certain to those who require it as by any arrangements of society it can be made."—(Polit. Economy, v. xi. 13).

It is worth while to observe how the various theories mentioned above fall into their proper place when once we have a plain matter-of-fact principle to go upon.

¹ It is very clearly stated as the "principle" of poor relief in the report from Massachusetts.—Mr. Henley's Report, p. 78.

Take, for instance, the question of "rights." Every destitute person has a right to relief, not because his "status," i.e. his miserable condition, gives him a title to it (which is an obsolete idea suitable only to primitive stages of social growth), but because the State has made for its own purposes a contract to stand between its citizens and death by starvation; for, as it has been well said, every Government enactment securing relief to the indigent is of the nature of a compact between the State and each of its members. And for practical purposes, either by legal relief or organised charity, this right is conferred by every civilized society.

Once more, this principle enables us to draw a clear line between State relief and private charity. The motive of the former is primarily and chiefly the welfare, or, at any rate, the resolution of the giver; whereas charity ceases to be charity if the giver puts his own comfort or interests before the needs of the recipient. Hence there can be no such thing as legal charity, and, melancholy as the assertion may sound, it nevertheless follows that although, of course, all human beings ought to act humanely towards each other, yet we are not to look, in a system of State relief, for moral graces such as gratitude from the recipient, or liberality from the official giver who dispenses other people's money. "Free charity indeed," exclaimed a blunt Dutchman, in a parliamentary debate, "with my neighbour's hand in my pocket!" This distinction may turn out in the future to be of much importance in mapping out the two provinces of legal relief and voluntary charity.

We shall see, when we come to deal with it, how far the history of Poor Laws in England bears out the opinion already alluded to, that they were due neither to humanity nor genuine utilitarianism, but to the interests of mere class selfishness. At present it may be sufficient to observe that the true statement of the case would seem to be that the selfishness of the upper classes took advantage of the growing spirit of humanity, and made a kind of tacit bargain with it, whereby, upon condition that localities provided for the relief of the "impotent," they were authorized to reduce the able-bodied labourer to a state of practical slavery, under the plea of setting him to work. But we have little doubt that the Report of the Committee of the House of Commons in 1817,—viz. "the principle of a compulsory provision for the impotent, and for setting to work the able-bodied, originated in motives of the purest humanity,"—contains, with the omission of the word "purest," a true description of the origin of Poor Laws in England. At any rate the motive of humanity, let it have been ever so small, has long survived the interests of selfishness, and may be assigned as the decisive reason why Poor Laws have continued to exist long after they could, with any plausibility, be described as instruments designed to oppress or enslave the labouring classes.

Seeing, then, that societies cannot allow any of their members to perish from preventible causes, the first and main object of Poor Law legislation is plainly to provide a certain maintenance for all indigent persons,—that is, those who, from any cause whatever, have come to such a condition as that, without help, they would die of want. But then, as Mr. Mill goes on to point out, in all cases of helping there are two sets of consequences to be considered,—the consequences of the assistance itself, and the consequences of relying on it. "The former are generally beneficial, but the latter for the most part injurious." This, indeed, is a very mild statement of the evils which, as a matter of history, have arisen from relying upon the certainty of relief, whether by public law or private charity. We shall endeavour to give some faint idea of them when we come to deal with the old English Poor Law, under which they rose to a height unprecedented, perhaps, except in Belgium. At present we merely indicate the chief sources from which they flow, although in truth they are so subtle, so intricate, and so mixed, that it is difficult to describe them generally, much more to arrange them under heads.

(1.) The knowledge that the necessities of life can be had for the asking naturally induces men who are not really destitute to throw themselves upon the State for aid. Hence State relief inevitably promotes idleness, with its kindred vices.

(2.) The same knowledge induces men to look forward to being supported by State relief whenever the time shall come that they are really destitute; whence comes dependence, with all the faults that follow in its train.

(3.) The same knowledge quenches the natural sentiment of the human heart towards relatives or friends, the care of whom is thrown off upon the law in place of those to whom it properly belongs. Hence inhumanity and selfishness.

(4.) The provision of State relief, especially if the true principles of social or political economy are not understood, leads to interference with the natural course of trade and employment, besides benefiting particular interests or localities (generally those who least need it) at the expense of poorer or weaker neighbours.

If, then, the first great object of Poor Law legislation be the provision of relief for the destitute, we may properly describe the second object as the prevention of the evils and abuses that flow from the first. And in point of fact the history of Poor Laws, down to recent times, is one long melancholy record of admitted and repeated failures to deal with evils that recur with monotonous persistency, or break out in new forms, or evade the best meant schemes for putting them down. Naturally enough a mere policy of repression was first attempted, and by degrees a second principle, which may be almost called the charter of Poor Law reform, was arrived at, and is now in theory everywhere admitted, though still in practice too often sinned against. We take the description of it from the singularly able report on the further amendment of the Poor Law in 1839 by Mr. Levevre, Sir George Nicholls, and Sir George Cornwall Lewis, to which we would gladly refer the reader for full information on the theory and practice of poor relief, but that it is unfortunately out of print. They say (p. 45):—

“The fundamental principle with respect to the legal relief of the poor is, that the condition of the pauper ought to be, on the whole, less eligible than that of the independent labourer. The equity and expediency of this principle are equally obvious. Unless the condition of the pauper is, on the whole, less eligible than that of the independent labourer, the law destroys the strongest motives to good conduct, steady industry, providence, and frugality among the labouring classes, and induces persons, by idleness or imposture, to throw themselves upon the poor rates for support. But if the independent labourer sees that a recurrence to the poor rates will, while it protects him against destitution, place him in a less eligible position than that which he can attain to by his own industry, he is left to the undisturbed influence of all those motives which prompt mankind to exertion, forethought, and self-denial. On the other hand, the pauper has no just ground for complaint if at the same time that his physical wants are amply provided for, his condition should be less eligible than that of the poorest class of those who contribute to his support."

In the last clause the two fundamental principles of Poor Laws are brought together, i.e. relief for the destitute, but so as that their condition shall be worse than if they had taken pains to support themselves. There is, however, a third, and, though subsidiary, hardly less important object at which legislation has aimed with but scanty results in different countries. Partly because there are deteriorating effects upon the class which cannot be altogether met by measures directed against abuses by individuals, partly because when once the State has interfered between men and the natural consequences of their own behaviour, it cannot help being drawn into further measures on their behalf, there emerges another object, which may be described as the prevention of the pauperising effects of State relief by measures calculated to raise the condition of the working classes. Thus the description of the objects of legal provision for the support of the poor in Massachusetts is as follows:—"This intervention is generally limited to the relief of absolute necessity to save life or prevent disease and suffering. But incidentally it aims at improving the condition of the poor, by teaching and training the young for work and self-dependence, by inculcating morality and promoting industry, cleanliness, and temperance.”—(Mr. Henley’s Report, p. 78.)

We have thus, then, arrived at the three main objects which Poor Laws are framed to carry out, and round which all their various institutions and provisions can be arranged. These are—

- (1.) Relief measures to support the indigent.
- (2.) Repressive measures to put down, and
- (3.) Remedial measures to prevent, the abuses and evils which are sure to be engendered by a system of State relief. By what means men have attempted to attain each of these three objects will be detailed in the next chapter.

CHAPTER II.

POOR LAW INSTITUTIONS.

WE propose in this chapter to enumerate, with such brief description and comparison as is possible, the various institutions, enactments, and arrangements which Poor Laws have called into existence. By way of giving as clear and comprehensive a view as the nature of the subject allows, we shall classify them under the following six heads :—

| I. The Authorities by whom | } relief is administered. |
| II. The Funds from which | |
| III. The Persons to whom | |
| IV. The Methods by which | |
| V. Repressive Measures. | |
| VI. Remedial Measures. | |

The above classification does not pretend to any scientific accuracy, which, to say truth, would be an almost impossible undertaking: thus the "House" is at once a method of relief and a repressive measure. But the reader will, we trust, be enabled to compare the various forms which poor relief has assumed in different countries, and to discern from what states of society or modes of thinking they have grown up.

Attempts have been made to classify Poor Laws according to the systems that obtain in various nations, but with a success so doubtful that it does not seem worth while to fatigue the memory of the reader by adding another to the list. It must be, however, understood, that there will meet us at every turn a plain, broad distinction between the Teutonic or Scandinavian and Protestant nations of the north, and the Latin and Catholic nations of the south. This makes it all the more to be regretted that there is no available information about the present state of things in Switzerland, except a brief account, as far back as 1834, of the Canton of Berne, where things appear to have been as bad as they were in England at that time, and from much the same causes.—(Mr. Morier's Report. See Quarterly Review for December 1835, which contains a brief summary of the Reports from foreign countries.)

As our object is to gain a general idea of what Poor Law has been and has done, before entering into the details of English legislation, we shall allude to the latter as little as possible in this chapter, reserving it for fuller treatment hereafter.

I. The Authorities by whom poor relief is administered.—As the way in which the various authorities—local (i.e. parochial, or communal), municipal, provincial, and central—came to be concerned in the administration of Poor Law, is a matter of historical growth, we may divide the history roughly into three periods: that before the Reformation, that between the Reformation and the French Revolution, and lastly, the ninety years that have elapsed since that event. In the first period there was virtually no Poor Law at all, only a series of enactments, horrible in their revolting severity against pauperism, especially in the form of vagrancy ; and another series, if possible, more detestable, against the rights of free labour. But the indigent and miserable were left to the care of the Church, which, it must be confessed, was rich enough and powerful enough to make it certain that relief in some shape would be forthcoming to those who needed it. The monasteries afforded food and shelter to the mendicant, and something like out-relief to the destitute inhabitants of the districts in which they were placed. There was also a claim upon lords of the manor for the maintenance of their dependants, a state of things which survived in Russia until the year 1864. Something, too, was done by trade guilds towards the support of their own members, traces of which,—as for instance in the case of the London companies,—still remain. But for a genuine survival of mediæval arrangements we must look to the Turkish empire, in which (Mahomet having exhorted his people to show kindness to the poor, not to oppress the orphan nor repulse the beggar) poor relief is still expressly associated with religious institutions. The mosques have been endowed with large funds for ecclesiastical and charitable purposes, one portion of which was set aside by Suleiman the Magnificent for the support of institutions such as Poor Laws provide elsewhere, including, however, baths and fountains. And the Greeks, at any rate in Constantinople, provide for the wants of their own people in a somewhat similar way, by committees of five leading members selected from the congregation of each parish church at an annual vestry meeting.

At the Reformation it became evident that the nations which had accepted the change in religion could no longer, for a variety of reasons, of which the splitting up into sects and the confiscation of Church property may be assigned as the chief, depend upon the Church for the adequate administration of relief. This was due not so much to the mere dissolution of the monasteries, as Adam Smith puts it, but to the altered relations between Church and State ; and especially to the conception of a National Church, which made it natural for the State to prescribe, or itself to undertake, functions and duties hitherto appropriated to the Church, regarded as an independent body. A curious and convincing proof of this is to be found in the fact that in Sweden, where the connection between Church and State has always been of the closest, the "first State law which laid the foundation of poor relief was the Church ordinance of 1571." It is possible, moreover, that the special form which Poor Law legislation everywhere adopted, namely, the parochial or communal, was determined by a revival of the old principle of local government, of which the village community was the primitive type, being regarded as a self-contained society capable of making fit provision for the wants of its own members. However this may be, there sprang up everywhere, during the earlier part of this second period, the simplest form of Poor Laws, which consisted in a command from the State that each parish should in some way or other maintain its own poor, and should appoint "overseers" to discharge the duty thus legally imposed upon it. At Hamburg, so early as 1529, directions were published for the guidance of the overseers ; "to visit the houses in their respective districts once every month, in order to make themselves acquainted with the circumstances of the poor; to provide employment for those who were able to work; to lend money without interest to those who were honest, and could with a little assistance maintain an independent position; and lastly, to grant permanent relief to the disabled and sick.”¹ It would be difficult, with all our experience, to give a better account of the spirit which ought to preside over the administration of poor relief than this; and we may add, a similar spirit may be (though more faintly) discerned in English legislation during the reigns of the Tudor kings, previous to the definite establishment of poor relief in 1601. Two years later, in 1531, the Emperor, Charles V., directed collections to be made in all places throughout the Netherlands for the settled poor—the idlers and rogues to be set to work, poor women and children provided for; the latter put to school, and afterwards placed out in service or in trade.² A law of the German Empire, in 1577, compelled parishes “to support their own poor, send away strangers, and provide accommodation for the sick.” And to take an instance from Scandinavian nations, the “fundamental code” of Denmark, dated 1683, formally asserted the right of needy persons to receive public assistance.

Thus there was established all over northern Europe an artless but thoroughly well-meaning system of poor relief, according to which each locality was expected to make provision for the three main classes of paupers, the vagrant, the impotent, and the able-bodied out of work, using upon the whole its own discretion in furtherance of this end, subject to certain enactments which were more of the nature of suggestions than of positive obligation. Something of this still lingers on in the Baltic Provinces of the Russian Empire, with the parish committee, parish wardens, the power to set men to work, and (what was added afterwards) magisterial or police control.

Meanwhile, in southern Europe, during the same period, except that in France purely ecclesiastical management of charities had been to some extent combined with State supervision, things went on much as they had done before until the French Revolution. Then, and at each succeeding revolutionary outbreak, attempts were made to inaugurate a system of national compulsory relief under the influence of the socialistic spirit; but the struggle ended in the establishment of a form of poor relief that may be described as organized charity with each local commune for the area of administration. Perhaps the most impressive and final argument against legal or State relief was the spectacle of the abuses which a continuance of bad legislation had introduced into all the countries where Poor Laws had taken root. To the Committee of the National Assembly our Poor Law seemed, and with justice, to be the "plague spot of England." But then the French Revolution itself gave the impulse to that series of reforming movements all over Europe which has lasted till the present time, and produced remarkably similar effects in various countries. This is our third or reforming period, during which Poor Laws, among other institutions, have been everywhere made the subject of careful inquiry and sweeping changes, especially in respect of the authorities to whom their administration has been committed. Whence has arisen the state of things now existing, which we will proceed briefly to sketch, taking the authorities in the order of parochial (or communal), provincial, central, and municipal.

Before doing so one preliminary distinction must be drawn that reflects little credit upon our national reputation for common sense. Other countries found ready made to their hands a living and useful system of local government upon which they could and did graft the administration of poor relief. In England alone the humiliating truth must be confessed that no such system was to be found, and that whatever local government we possess at this moment has to a great extent grown up out of our Poor Law legislation. Thus the Local Government Board of to-day is merely the old Poor Law Commission of 1834, with new duties attached to it. The Guardians of Unions have by very slow degrees come to have other than Poor Law functions intrusted to them; while, as though to emphasise our most characteristic defects, the rate by which moneys (in rural parishes) are raised for all local purposes is still called the Poor Rate. What a curious chapter in the history of legislation does this one small fact point back to!

(1.) The Parish or Commune is all over Europe recognised as the unit of Poor Law administration, though under very different conditions. In Norway alone, where a plan of very minute subdivision prevails, do the local authorities appear to be in any way independent of the parish; they consist of special commissions, with the clergyman at their head in villages, and a magistrate in towns. The abuses, however, were such that in 1863 the power of levying special rates was taken from them and given to the parish, to which they are now virtually responsible. In most countries the Communal Board is also the primary Poor Law authority; this is the case in Sweden, Denmark, Prussia, Holland, Bavaria, Austria, and also in Italy and Portugal, where their duties in respect of poor relief are of a very minor character. But this arrangement is modified by the fact that in all the more important cases the Communal Board is empowered and expected to elect special committees, partly out of their own number, partly such of the leading inhabitants as are most fit to be trusted with the work, and who, as in Prussia, are compelled to serve under a penalty. In France, although the commune is still the administrative area, the separation of Poor Law duties from the commune goes a step further, "for the Legislature has separated the management of the funds destined for the poor from that of the municipal finances; and the interests of the poor are confided to other hands than those which undertake the general interests of the commune." After much contention, it was settled in 1872 to continue the plan of two separate (unpaid) commissions in each Commune: one to superintend the indoor relief of hospitals, asylums, and almshouses, the other to direct the local Board of out-relief (Bureau de bienfaisance), which every commune is at liberty to establish, though until recently two-thirds of the whole country appear to be without them, their place in some cases being supplied by a humbler but similar institution called the Bureau de Charité. These committees are, however, still connected with the communal authorities, who appoint two members, together with the mayor as ex officio chairman. The remaining members are nominated by very various authorities, such as the Prefect, the Court of Appeal, the Chamber of Commerce, the Bishop of the Diocese, the Presbyterian Council, and the Jewish Consistory. When appointed, they appear to be practically independent of the Commune, though not of other higher authorities.

The same system obtains in Belgium, but the Communes elect all the members of the committees and inspect their accounts, and thereby exercise a much larger control. In Saxony, on the other hand (which presents perhaps an instance of the most careful and elaborate Poor Law legislation to be found out of England), we have the opposite extreme of an almost complete separation of the Parochial from the Poor Law authorities. The plan there is, that the "Head Boroughs" of the villages (themselves nominated by the Government) shall constitute a Poor Law Board, composed of the "inhabitants of the district who are conspicuous by their intelligence, their experience, the active interest they show in all matters of public utility, and the confidence they enjoy among their fellow-citizens." It is further prescribed that landowners, clergymen, schoolmasters, presidents of private charitable institutions, and physicians, should be always invited to join the committees, and that such officials as the Head Boroughs themselves, judges, and trustees of charitable foundations, should be members ex officio.

The employment of assistant officers seems generally left to the discretion of the local authorities, who do not, as far as can be seen, rely much upon paid help. In France, the duties of relieving officers,—besides, of course, the work of indoor-relief,—is largely performed by members of female religious orders, who, it is said, discharge the various tasks of supervision, inquiry, and furnishing reports, with much devotion and intelligence. They receive salaries for their work. In New York State, incredible as it may sound, the overseers were—perhaps are—paid a fee for each pauper relieved. It is only necessary to add that in most countries of Northern Europe there exists a power of forming Unions of small parishes for such objects as the establishment of workhouses, or the suppression of mendicity, and, on the other hand, of dividing large districts and placing them under local sub-committees. It does not very clearly appear how far these powers are acted upon, but probably not to so great an extent as to interfere with communal authority or responsibility.

(2.) The duties of provincial authorities, are, as might be supposed, of the slightest. We may notice, however, that in some places they exercise a control over the accounts; that (e.g. in Prussia, where there are thirty-six provincial Unions) they relieve those who cannot be made chargeable to any special Commune; that they sometimes decide disputes between Poor Boards, especially in respect of “settlement;” and that in France the establishments for abandoned children and lunatics are departmental and not communal, as also is the Correctional Workhouse or Dépôt de Mendicité. The department may also, in case of necessity, subsidise the communal treasury, and the budget of all charitable establishments is submitted to the Prefect.

(3.) There is no special department of the Central Government charged with the duty of managing the administration of poor relief, except in Sweden, which framed its laws upon the English model, and where it is said the working people used to demand out-relief because they had been told it was given in England. There we find a Central Board and an officer called his Majesty's Governor. Elsewhere the State does little but exercise such general control as a Minister of Interior can always bring to bear upon local or provincial authorities. Sometimes the State, as in Prussia, distributes a small sum of money on its own account, generally to the widows and orphans of soldiers, sometimes in aid of local Unions. In France all establishments for indoor-relief are under State supervision, and are, of course, liable to be interfered with by zealous ministers. But as a rule that which constitutes the special excellence of the English system,—control by a central authority, able to impart something of scientific exactness into the administration of relief,—is not sought for in foreign countries, unless it be to some extent in the United States, where there are Central Boards, who examine and pass accounts, can admit and transfer paupers to the various charitable institutions, and possess certain "advisory" powers. But it is impossible to give any adequate idea of so very complicated a system as that which prevails in the United States.

(4.) In respect of large cities every other nation except our own has understood—first, that they require a different organization from that which answers in rural or small places ; secondly, that emancipation from the control of the Town Council must lead to administrative weakness. Hence there is no such thing as separate Boards of Guardians in large towns, except once more in America, though in many places the plan has been adopted of establishing a Board of Relief that "should have its root in the municipality, and yet act independently of it." At Hamburg, indeed, which is the parent of this system, the General Board for the Relief of the Poor is only connected with the Town Council by having representatives from it, and being presided over by a burgomaster. In Leipzig the "Directorium" is authorized by the Council to administer relief, and is liable to control, or even dismissal, by superior authority ; in other respects it chooses its own officers and modes of carrying on its work. In Paris (and Lyons) there is a special administration, with twenty districts for outdoor-relief, each with a council held at the mairie, the mayor being president, and the whole subject to the Prefect of the Seine. It is, however, impossible to enter more fully into details, though, when we come to speak of modes of investigation, we shall have to recur to the very interesting and valuable experiments that are being carried on in some German cities. Suffice it to say that Committees or Boards, connected more or less closely with the municipalities, are everywhere the rule.

II. The Funds from which relief is administered.—These may be classified as follows:—(a) Rates ; (b) Special Taxes ; (c) Communal Property ; (d) Endowments ; (e) Charitable Offerings ; (f) Repayment recovered from paupers or their friends. These form the revenue of the Communes, and we may complete the list by adding (g) Subsidies from the revenue of the State, and (h) of the Department. Setting aside our own country, where the funds are raised entirely by local rates, and America, where they are paid by appropriations out of the general taxation of the towns and of the States, the invariable rule is that the necessary funds are provided by the Commune from one or more of the above-named sources (with subsidies from the State), and are made over to the Communal Committee or Poor Board to which the administration of relief is entrusted. That is to say, the ordinary communal revenue does not (with the possible exception of Denmark) defray the cost of poor relief, which is provided for by special portions of the communal resources that have been either by law or private gifts appropriated to the relief of destitution.

We shall select as an example of the various sources from which communal poor funds are commonly derived the case of Saxony, which includes all the more important ones, and may therefore give the reader a fair idea of the state of things that prevails generally. They are no less than fifteen in number, and may be supplemented by rates if required.

Casual Receipts. — (1.) Collections at weddings and other Church ordinances.

(2.) Taxes levied wherever there is a change in the ownership of property.

(3.) Legacies and donations.

(4.) Duties upon inheritances.

(5.) Money collected in boxes at post-offices, inns, etc. etc.

(6.) Taxes paid for public performances, exhibitions, etc. etc.

(7.) Fines appropriated by law for poor relief.

Regular Receipts.—(8.) Collections made at churches, and gifts from Church property.

(9.) Contributions from the revenues of communities.

(10.) Voluntary house to house collections, or, in lieu of this, rates, wherever they have been declared permanent by the Poor Law Board.

(11.) Contributions of private clubs.

Other Receipts belonging to the Poor Law Fund itself.—(12.) Interest and rent of property.

(13.) Paupers' work.

(14.) Repayments by paupers who have subsequently prospered.

(15.) Property left by paupers who have died in public hospitals.

How far in rural districts these sources of income require to be supplemented by the communal treasury it is impossible to say; but if Hamburg, Berlin, and Elberfeld may be taken as fair specimens of the state of things in German towns, the supplementary grant far exceeds the original revenue. Thus at Hamburg in 1870 the private revenue was £25,783, and the grant from the public treasury was £60,453. At Berlin the grant in aid was nearly five times the amount of the Poor Fund, £136,867 to £28,650, and of this latter £8684 was recovered from paupers or their relations. At Elberfeld the two were more nearly equal, though the grant from the municipal funds was still the larger, £7424 to £5901.

We shall now select a few other characteristic or important sources of revenue that are made use of in other countries.

In Sweden the Commune levies a special tax on manufacturers who have drawn together a large working population, and it also receives compensation from the State for relief granted to soldiers, sailors, and labourers in public employ. Norway levies a tax (communal) on cards, spirits, and beer. Sweden, again, exacts a Poll Tax upon every male over eighteen to the amount of 6½d. per annum, and upon every female to the amount of 3¼d. Saxe Coburg appropriates the profits of a gymnasium. Leipzig sends round subscription collectors armed with powers that recall the old joke, "There is no compulsion, only you must," for it is "known that those who deny themselves or refuse to contribute are liable to be summoned and taxed." Austria confiscates part of the property of Catholic clergymen who die intestate. Rome demands a contribution from newly created cardinals. Bavaria insists that workmen employed out of their own commune shall pay to a sick fund, and compels employers to make some provision for their work-people, generally by contributing to a benefit club. Charities in France derive benefits from burial-grounds, theatres, pawnshops (so also in Italy), and lotteries. The Greek Committees make a good thing out of the sale of candles; while, to crown the list, a single caged nightingale is said to pay five thalers a year to the poor fund at Elberfeld.

In Holland, we may add, the sources of public relief are almost entirely charitable, and it is only after rigorous investigation that the law allows subsidies to be made to the various charitable institutions to which the relieving of the destitute is formally made over, and which are all more or less subject to municipal control. But even so the tendency to rely upon public money seems exceedingly strong, as indeed is sure to be the case. Thus, in 1871, out of a total expenditure of £897,139, 32 per cent (£287,011) was provided from the public revenue, of which £203,247 went to subsidise the charities.

The evidence from France points to a similar conclusion. There the customary municipal subsidy varies in amount from more than one-half in the department of the Seine (Paris) to somewhat more than one sixth in the provinces. If to this we add the fact that the State or the Department maintain certain institutions for indoor-relief (in France the State maintains seven in whole or in part, one of them being an asylum for the blind, founded in 1260 by St. Louis), we shall appreciate the force of the remarks made in the report from Belgium :—“In theory the relief of the poor is essentially a communal duty, and should cost nothing to the province or the State. In practice, however, both these bodies are obliged to assume some share of the burden.” So that the distinction between legal and charitable relief, as practised in England and France respectively, becomes comparatively unimportant. Both systems have indeed their one strong point. In England the wholesome rule (too much of late departed from) that localities should defray the cost of their own poor relief tends to keep pauperism down. In France (and elsewhere) the organization and supervision of charity prevents a thousand evils.

III. Those to whom relief is administered.—The causes and conditions of indigence are everywhere the same, and produce the same classes of pauperised persons. These need not, therefore, be separately treated, but we shall attempt to give a general view of all the various kinds of persons to whom the name Pauper has been or may be correctly applied.

There is a broad distinction made by nature itself between the impotent and the able-bodied. The first may be divided into two classes: those who have never had the chance of providing for themselves, and those who have had the chance and neglected to use it. The second also may be divided into those who are (presumably) willing to get their own living, but are prevented by adverse circumstances, and those who notoriously decline to work. Hence we have these four classes:—

First, The impotent who suffer from no fault of their own, among whom may be included (a) the constitutionally infirm, e.g. the blind; (b) imbeciles of different kinds; (c) fatherless children, whether orphans, deserted, or bastards.

Second, The impotent who might have done better for themselves by the exercise of virtue and forethought. These include (d) the aged; (e) the permanently sick (i.e. who have become so more or less early in life); (f) lying-in women (unmarried).

Thirdly, The able-bodied who, as being settled in one place, and having some ostensible means of gaining a living, are nevertheless out of work. Under this head may be included paupers (g) from lack of employment, (h) from temporary illness, (i) from insufficient wages to support the families dependent on them.

Fourthly, The able-bodied who notoriously prefer idleness to work, and who may be divided into (j) mendicants and (k) vagrants.

To these eleven classes we may add a twelfth, namely—(l) Widows with families, whom, though “able-bodied” themselves, they cannot nevertheless be expected to maintain, even with full employment. These form everywhere the recipients of poor relief called paupers, and a mere glance at the list will serve to show how varied are the problems which Poor Law administration is expected to grapple with, and how likely it is that mistakes should be made.

IV. The Methods by which relief is administered.—These once more are the same in all places, and are too familiar to need explanation. They are divided into two kinds, corresponding broadly with the two classes of impotent and able-bodied, as above described; that is to say, indoor-relief as generally employed for the former, and out-relief for the latter,—vagrants, however, being exceptionally dealt with. Of these we may also enumerate twelve principal ones, as follows:—

Indoor-relief, comprising (a) poorhouses (this general term includes almshouses and workhouses, which practically are not distinguishable); (b) hospitals; (c) asylums; (d) schools, including reformatories; (e) vagrant wards.

Out-relief, comprising (f) gifts of money; (g) gifts in kind; (h) giving of employment; (i) apprenticing of children; (j) medical attendance; (k) burial.

To these may be added, as something that partakes of the nature of both out and indoor relief, and is perhaps older than either, the curious plan of (l) boarding out which still survives in some places. Of this (the rest speak for themselves) a brief explanation may not be uninteresting, especially as we shall come upon some trace of it in the "Roundsman" of the old English Poor Law. It was found convenient in early times, and in thinly-populated agricultural districts, to lodge the paupers out,—that is, to place them with householders in rotation, to be fed and sheltered. This custom, which was once widely extended, and still lingers on in parts of Austria and Sweden, is in full operation in Norway alone, where it is called the "Lægd." In 1832 very minute regulations were issued to prevent abuses, the superintendent of the lægd being required to report improper conduct on either side, and have the parties fined or imprisoned. The peasants to this day uphold the system, believing that it takes no more to feed an extra guest, and that to receive him keeps alive the feeling of voluntary benevolence. But the farmers, who are liable to have whole families quartered upon them for relief, either in their own houses or at the paupers' home, make many complaints of indolent and impertinent guests.

The reader will not expect any account of the multitudinous varieties of operation by which the above-mentioned (12) methods are applied to the relief of the (12) classes of indigent persons covered by the name pauper: there is the less occasion for this, inasmuch as, compared with the general resemblance, the differences are but superficial. Practically, whether by State-guaranteed support, or by organized and subsidised charity, or by a mere abundance of voluntary benevolence (as in Italy and Portugal), there are established all over Europe local authorities to whom the pauper can apply in expectation of receiving that sort of relief which is deemed suitable to his case, and which, we strongly suspect, differs very little indeed in different countries. On the other hand, the absence of those two main points of the English system, central control and the workhouse test, does certainly produce some results which it is well worth our while to point out.

First, we may notice that there is a unanimous complaint on the part of all English inquirers that foreign countries fall far below our own in the important particular of obtaining trustworthy statistics; Sweden, which possesses a central Department, being the only exception. Thus, of France it is said that "statistics are collected somewhat irregularly;" of Belgium, that "there are no published Poor Law returns for the whole kingdom since 1858;" of Prussia, that "the absence of statistical information in a country where social subjects are so closely studied is attributed to the fact that each commune would start from a more or less different basis;" of the United States, "that a sound basis for calculating the comparative amount of pauperism in England and America is altogether wanting," Massachusetts, however, forming a partial exception.

From the absence of local control it follows that the communal authorities,—that is, the Poor Law Board, which represents them,—possess a discretion as to the administration of relief far beyond that enjoyed by an English Board of Guardians. The State contents itself with, at most, laying down certain principles, and then leaving it to the Poor Law Boards to carry them out in their own way; even in Sweden the Poor Law Boards determine independently the manner of relief, which may, according to the law, "vary with the peculiarities of the district." In Saxony "the State interferes only in cases of necessity." Generally speaking, the rule is that the State insists upon the commune providing relief for the destitute, defines who the destitute are, and then leaves it to the discretion of the local authorities. Of this rule the Prussian law of 1871 may serve as an example:—"Every German has, in case of distress, the right to demand of his commune a roof, the absolute necessities of life, medical attendance in case of illness, and in case of death a suitable burial. Relief may be granted either by admission into a poorhouse or hospital, or by allotting work proportioned to the strength of the pauper, either in such an institution or out of it."

The conditions of indoor-relief are also in some respects different from what they are in England, owing to the absence of the Workhouse Test. In foreign countries the functions of an English workhouse are divided between almshouses where relief is administered, and correctional houses where repression is carried on to an extent unknown amongst ourselves. These last belong to our next division, and will be mentioned hereafter. As to the almshouses, the inmates are much the same as in an English workhouse, namely, the aged, infirm, and sick; the number of children, it is to be hoped, is growing less. But, as the poorhouse is not used as a test of want, the need of repressive discipline is not felt; and the natural sentiments of compassion towards the kind of persons who occupy it tend to make it a tolerably easy and even indulgent place of residence. Complaints upon this head are constant. Thus, to take two instances, the workhouse in Copenhagen was said some ten years ago to be an example of all that such an institution should not be. Brandy to the amount of 6000 quarts, and tobacco to the amount of 1000 dollars, were sold every year to the inmates, of whom in 1867 about half absconded with property belonging to the house. At Elberfeld the poorhouse, though not very well arranged, is occupied by a contented set of inmates, who are well fed and clad, and enjoy their freedom,—those who can work going out by day to do it, and receiving for their own use whatever they earn above the cost of their maintenance. “In short” (as the report says) “an old Elberfeld pauper smoking his eternal pipe in the day-room of the poorhouse may well feel that he has got a comfortable asylum for the close of his days.” We may notice that the alms-house or asylum for the aged and infirm is an important institution in America, where also it was liable to many of the worst abuses of the old English poorhouse; but these have been of late years reformed by sending the able-bodied paupers, tramps, and others, who used to throng to them in winter or when suffering from disease, to houses of correction. In America the adaptation of houses to the different classes of paupers seems excellently done.

It may be mentioned here that the practice of exacting from indoor paupers remunerative labour either at their own trades or at some occupation suitable to their capacity, still prevails on the Continent,—at any rate among the northern nations. Public opinion in England has clearly pronounced this to be an economical and also a Poor Law mistake. But this general rule does not apply to task-work done at houses of correction.

As to out-relief in foreign countries, it would seem to be, as might be expected, upon the whole much more capricious and unequal, much more unsatisfactory, and, in proportion to its amount, more pauperising, than in England, where in truth there is not much to boast of. It is kept down certainly in France, and probably elsewhere, by the fact that it is limited not by the extent of destitution to be relieved, but by the amount of the funds which the authorities have to spend. But then this leads to a system of small temporary doles that pauperise without relieving. Then again, the Bureaus are said to be too numerous and badly arranged. Then again, there are the usual complaints that the administration of relief is confided to overseers, often small shopkeepers, who have no time to obtain the necessary information, and, being afraid of incurring odium, "fall into habits of blind and wholesale benevolence." And lastly, there is a growing conviction that in every case the amount of pauperism depends not upon the circumstances of the working classes, but upon the facility with which help may be obtained. The crucial instance is Belgium, where the communes possessed of the largest charitable resources have the most paupers, and Luxembourg, with next to no revenues, has also next to no pauperism.

It may serve to illustrate the confusion and uncertainty still prevalent upon this subject, that in America the State of New York, on the one hand (taught by the disastrous results of indiscriminate charity), in 1876 resolved to make no appropriation of funds for out-relief, and that the State of Massachusetts in the same year passed an Act for the express purpose of extending it.

V. Repressive Measures.—We shall take the means whereby legislators have endeavoured to prevent the abuses of poor relief in their chronological order, and arrange them as follows :—

(a) Punishment, or the simple remedy of earlier times, which is now confined to vagrants, impostors, and incorrigibles.

(b) Settlement, or the first limitation of the conditions upon which relief was given.

(c) Compulsory maintenance, including payments by friends, and repayments by the pauper himself.

Direct repression, including (d) house test ; (e) labour test ; (f) correctional houses ; (g) criminal punishment ; and (h) investigation, this latter being used not only as a means of discovery, but as a repelling measure. These methods of direct repression form the modern solution of the pauper difficulty, and touch by far the hardest and most debated problems of poor relief.

The broad distinction between the English method of applying repression (which, of course, we shall consider at length in its place) and the foreign may be summed up in one short but important proposition. In England every other mode of repression is much less stringent than elsewhere, because the workhouse test has superseded them all. With us the relieving authority can offer the House, whenever there is any uncertainty as to the reality of the destitution, and the result naturally follows that, having this formidable and efficient weapon to fall back on, punitive regulations even in the case of “tramps” are almost unknown ; settlement is becoming quite a simple and easy matter ; the distinction between relief in money and in kind, which is much thought of on the Continent, is practically neglected ; maintenance by friends is not half enough insisted on ; and investigation, as elsewhere understood, there is practically none. Leaving this, however, for its proper place, we go on to give some account of the principle of repressive measures as carried out all over the world.

(1.) Punishment was the only remedy provided against pauperism (then known only under the forms of begging, whether by mendicants or vagrants) during all those long centuries when punishment was least deserved by the pauper, and might, from our present point of view, with much more reason have been inflicted on the inflictors. Pauperism was to a great extent caused, and certainly aggravated, by legislation either economically vicious, or else directed avowedly against the interests of the working classes in a spirit that can only be excused by the fact that it marked the period of transition from slavery to independence. Then it was sought to extirpate it by means that "makes this part of (English) history look like the history of savages in America. Almost all severities have been inflicted, except scalping." In England, France, Spain, and the German Empire, we read the same dismal tale of whipping, branding, the pillory, burning the ear, cropping the ear, couples chained together to cleanse sewers, long terms of imprisonment, and, finally, death itself, in hundreds every year in every country. A good deal of this severity still remains in the treatment of vagrants even now. In France Napoleon decreed that vagrancy should cease, but, as a French writer remarks, "the beggars made a mock of him who made a mock at kings. He is gone—they remain." (It is a tempting epigram to say that if in France the vagrant mastered the conqueror of kings, in England the pauper proved too much for the conqueror of the conqueror, during whose pre-eminence in politics nothing was done to abate the evil.) And, generally, it may be said of all countries except our own that police regulations of a character so harsh as to tend to defeat their own purpose is the method adopted for dealing with beggars, the old plan of sending them back to their own parishes after imprisonment still finding favour. Two exceptions, however, are noteworthy. In Italy (the history of which is full of quaint stories of beggar companies and their rights and customs) the infirm even now,—that is, by a law of 1865,—receive a license to beg upon condition of being civil, and not disgusting people by the exhibition of their sores, thereby carrying the mind back to the old Scotch days of that prince of mendicants, the King's Bedesman, Edie Ochiltree by name. And in Poland there are no restrictions at all upon professional mendicancy, owing, it is said, to the old Slave superstition that it is unlucky to turn a beggar away. Does this same superstition, it might be asked, at all account for the persistency with which beggars are relieved by persons much poorer than themselves in English country places?

(2.) Settlement. The meaning of this innocent-looking word, big with legal intricacies and manifold disaster to the interests of the working people, is merely that paupers must be relieved in the place in which they are "settled," or have "gained a settlement," and that if they are relieved in any other parish than their own they must be sent back to it, and the expenses of their maintenance charged upon it. The place of settlement or domicile, as it is called abroad, is primarily the place where a man is born. No doubt the law of settlement was not at first intended as a means of repression. The Reformation was marked in some respects by a return to the old primitive notion of village government, and it seems to have been thought that each parish was an independent community, capable of maintaining its own indigents. But as society advanced, and men, hitherto chained to their own parishes, began to move about in the world, a second principle,—the principle, as it may be called, of universal selfishness, by which every other nation, class, city, or even village, is regarded as a kind of rival, if not enemy, against which “protective” measures have to be taken,—began to come into operation. The larger and wealthier parishes, on the one hand, the landowners on the other, reaped the advantage of the labour of workpeople, and then devised the law of settlement as an excuse for passing them back to their own parishes in age or sickness. In Germany the evil was aggravated to an intolerable extent by the jealousies of the small States, and was not finally grappled with till the establishment of the German Empire some ten or eleven years ago.

But whatever its origin, settlement was always practically a repressive measure. It went upon the simple principle that each locality knew most about its own paupers, and could deal best with them, and it fixed the penalty of confinement to the place of settlement upon the pauper's head. Hence, as less artless measures of repression have prevailed, and a sense has grown up that the interests of localities are after all identical, the law of settlement has become far more lenient and simple. A few instances of the present state of the law may be useful. In France the Bureau of out-relief (or out-charity as it might be called) may not relieve, except the recipient has been domiciled in the commune at least one year. In Belgium the term of residence was first one year, then four, then eight, and finally it was proposed, in the interests of the rural communes, to diminish it to one. In the German Empire, where the laws of the separate States prescribed different periods, a Federal law of 1870 prescribed two years as sufficient to obtain a settlement. In Sweden a person's settlement is in the Union where he was last registered for Poll Tax, which would seem practically to abolish it. But in Holland alone has settlement been formally done away, and the task of relief been "committed to the humanity of the whole nation in its different localities." But then Holland relies so entirely, in theory at any rate, upon the charities, that the abolition of settlement is rendered all the easier.

On the other hand, the State of Massachusetts in 1874 increased the already numerous ways of obtaining settlement (resembling what will meet us in English Poor Law history), with the intention of increasing the proportion of outdoor to indoor relief,—a curious retrocession, due, we suspect, to the prevalence of American sentiment in a sphere where sentiment has wrought infinite harm to the very persons it meant to benefit.

(3.) Maintenance by friends and repayment by the pauper himself form a just and obvious mode of repression, to which recourse is had universally. Here once more we give a few leading instances. The duty of maintenance in some cases (Sweden and Denmark) does not extend beyond parents and children; and in the latter country it would appear that the maintenance of children is confined to eighteen years of age, and of parents to cases of disordered intellect. In France and Germany the duty ascends in the direct line, and is extended to children-in-law; in Italy brothers and sisters are included, and (apparently) by local regulations in some places in Germany, e.g. Berlin. In America the ordinary rule of direct ascent and descent prevails, but is "not well enforced, because of the vexation, expense, and disagreeable duty of enforcing it" (Massachusetts Report, p. 86). In Saxony even distant relations "may be invited by the Poor Law Board, in an appropriate manner, to fulfil the moral duties incumbent upon them in this respect." But what is the effect of this moral suasion does not appear.

As to repayment, great and laudable stress is laid upon this wholesome discipline in many countries. Thus, in Sweden the Poor Law Board has the right of mastership over the pauper until he has repaid the sum expended on his behalf. In Denmark the pauper's effects are registered, so as to prevent him pawning or selling his property, and the Commune has even some claim against his heir; in any case, relief is regarded as a debt to be paid even before rent or service, should his circumstances improve. The same holds in Germany, where the Commune inherits the pauper's property, and where considerable sums are retained as repayments. Thus the Commune often comes into possession of articles of furniture (sharing it with widows and children), which it sometimes lends out to deserving persons. In 1870 Berlin inherited £437 from this source.

(4.) Direct repression. Even if experience had not settled the matter, it might have been taken for certain that, sooner or later, the need would arise for stronger and more direct measures of repression when once an inducement had been held out to idle and worthless persons to avail themselves of the public bounty. And as a matter of fact nearly every nation has had occasion to reform its Poor Laws during the last half-century in this direction. That is to say, there has been a recurrence to some sort of penal legislation, in order to carry out the great principle of repression, which no one disputes in words, that the condition of the pauper should be less favourable than that of the self-supporting labourer. The English solution of the problem, namely, the imposition of the workhouse test, has found no favour with foreign Legislatures, though strongly recommended by high authorities. The reasons are partly sentimental, partly moral. The first is the familiar argument that it is wrong to disturb family ties, a doctrine which in France is pushed to the extreme of relieving the sick at home in preference to sending them to hospitals. Upon the same ground the workhouse at Leipzig was finally closed in 1849, after the experiment had been twice tried. The American argument is much the same, with the cry of economy superadded. Thus the Boston overseers declare that "this plan would separate families, permanently pauperise them, and is a doubtful measure of humanity or economy, as a little relief occasionally in many cases is all that is required, and is not necessarily demoralising." (This last clause would seem to most English authorities fatally erroneous.) But these arguments do not satisfy the more advanced and thorough German thinking which is summed up in a report on the Elberfeld system by L. F. Seyffardt, printed in the Reports from foreign countries. There the "moral development of the individual," "who positively deteriorates under the work-house system," is the argument relied on, the sentimental arguments coming second. The writer does not appear to have a very practical knowledge of the working of the English system, for he fails to notice that as a matter of fact the test is so effective that few persons who would be thought worthy of out-relief, still fewer who would deteriorate in the workhouse, ever find their way within its walls,—at any rate, with the intention of remaining there for any length of time.

But the point of interest is to observe how other countries have met the difficulty. They begin by drawing a broad distinction between ordinary distress and destitution due to the pauper's own fault, and then proceed to visit the latter with a correctional discipline the like to which is quite unknown amongst ourselves. And no doubt, granting that it is within the province and the capacity of the State to take cognisance of degrees of moral turpitude, it is refreshing to hear of correctional workhouses to which applicants of bad character are forthwith consigned and made to work. We have alluded to these before in connection with the punishment of vagrants, but it is by no means confined to this class of paupers. Thus in Berlin the police can order drunkards to be confined there for any period from one day to two years; so also in Sweden, Denmark, Bavaria, and Baden, where idleness and prostitution are added to the list of punishable offences; while at Elberfeld itself imprisonment for play, drink, idleness, and even the loss of means of support, was only abolished a few years ago against the will of the Poor Law administrators. In France, on the contrary, the Dépôts de Mendicité appear to be confined to the punishment of the vagrants or beggars for whom they were established. But the plan of correctional houses appears to have reached its greatest development in America. In New York, by a refinement of American humour, an able-bodied person applying for relief is obliged to endorse an order for admission to a workhouse for a definite period, thereby accomplishing the in other respects not very difficult task of "committing himself," and, when there, is set to some repulsive form of labour. And in Massachusetts, under an Act known as the Pipers and Fiddlers' Act, not merely rogues and vagabonds but (amongst others) stubborn children, common drunkards, night-walkers, brawlers, persons who neglect their families, frequenters of taverns and gaming-houses, and common pipers and fiddlers, may be, upon conviction, committed to the house of correction. At one time ordinary paupers were inmates of the same house, but there are now separate establishments.

There remains the larger class of paupers, whose faults, whatever they may be, do not amount to punishable crime. For these the only alternative mode of repression is to make things very uncomfortable for them by strict investigation and close supervision. This is the secret of the celebrated system in vogue at Elberfeld and other German cities, which the author above quoted expressly describes as a substitution for the workhouse test. At Elberfeld, a town of 71,000 population, there are 18 overseers and 252 visitors, one overseer with 14 visitors having charge over each section into which the town is divided, which makes one officer to about every 260 inhabitants. The visitors meet in their sections once a fortnight (the overseer presiding) to report and decide on applications for relief, the conditions of obtaining which are, that the applicant (if able-bodied) should be out of work, should be able to show that he has tried to obtain it, and should be willing to do what work is found for him. But before obtaining it he must answer every question in a "Question Paper," which really seems in our English eyes a kind of instrument of mental torture. It begins (at Leipzig, where there is the same system) with a little homily upon the necessity of candour, obedience, and modesty, and upon the results of pauperism to the recipient. He must give information as to every detail of his life, e.g. his work, change of residence, property, furniture. He must not keep a dog, nor go to a place of public entertainment. He is "constantly," i.e. not less than once a fortnight, looked up by the visitor, and every change is noted and reported. He must declare whether his family leads a moral and honest life, and "specify which members do not." The visitor is expected to reprimand disorderly conduct, to enforce cleanliness and honesty, to warn parents of their duties—especially education—towards their children, and children of theirs—especially reverence—towards their parents. In short, he must "strive to exercise a healthy influence over the moral feelings of the poor."

There can be no doubt as to the efficiency of this system of investigation as a repressive measure. In 1852 the number of paupers at Elberfeld was estimated at 4000 in a population of 50,000, or about 1 in 12. In 1873 it was 1863 in a population of 71,000, or about 1 in 38. But it is somewhat ominous that, as in the case of our own country, a reaction set in, and there were in 1873 800 more paupers than in 1869; the increase in population is, however, not stated for any year later than 1869, and the growth of pauperism is in part set down to the late Franco-German war. But, under any circumstances, the results are much the same as in the best English Unions.

VI. Remedial Measures.—Upon these we do not propose to speak at length. Some of them, such as moral supervision, procuring (private) employment, have been touched upon already, though the appointment of trustees in Saxony for drunkards and extravagant persons, to prevent them becoming chargeable, deserves a special word of mention. Others, such as loans, migration, emigration, allotments (more than 2000 persons rent potato ground of the Commune in Berlin, upon the recommendation of the Poor Law Board), do not need explanation. Others, such as sanitary inspection, school attendance, and vaccination, are only accidentally, though very properly, united with poor relief administration. But the truth is, that although the raising of the working classes above the need of pauperism is in theory set forth as one, if not the principal, object of legislation, yet what was said of the New York Society for Improving the Condition of the Poor applies in all cases:—"Its design is stated to be 'the elevation of the physical and moral condition of the indigent, and, so far as is compatible with these objects, the relief of their necessities.' In practice its operations are confined to the giving of relief."

But the trial of remedial measures is perhaps yet to come, and meanwhile the bare statement of such aims testifies to a growing desire to promote the welfare of labour. And though Burke's dictum is unquestionably true, that it is "not in the power of Governments to do much positive good," yet they can and ought to remove the evils which the ignorance or selfishness of previous generations have allowed to grow up. And especially something can be done to put the relations of charity and State relief upon a sounder footing. As a specimen of what has been attempted, and of what may be hoped for hereafter, we may fittingly bring this chapter to a close with the mention of the plan which the city of Boston adopted some years ago. The Corporation built, at a cost of 200,000 dollars, a Bureau of relief, at which, besides the offices for the overseers, there were also offices set apart for various charitable organisations, a registration of charities, and temporary homes for women and children. Applicants are referred then and there to the particular charity which can deal with their case, and thus some progress is made in what must be pronounced the capital article of future administration of relief,—namely, the separation between cases which can be dealt with by the public authorities without doing more harm to the community than they do good to the individual, and those which require the patience, the painstaking, and the benevolent sympathy that can be looked for from charity, and from charity alone.

CHAPTER III.

POOR LAW HISTORY.¹

THE existing system of poor relief in England is so entirely, both as to its principles and its institutions, a matter of gradual growth, that in giving some account of the earlier Poor Law we shall be virtually describing the essential elements and main features of that which is at present established. And as the history, even in the brief compendium which is all that we can attempt, is both interesting and valuable, whereas the details of administration can with difficulty be made so, we are the less reluctant to beg the reader's attention to what is, in truth, a singular episode in the annals of our social progress.

The old Poor Law came to an end, as most people know, in 1834; previous to which time it may be divided into three distinctly marked periods.

First, down to the death of Elizabeth in 1603, or more strictly to the famous Act which definitely established poor relief in England in 1601.

Second, down to a somewhat uncertain date, for which the accession of George III. in 1760 may be taken as a convenient point.

Third, down to the Reform of 1834.

The First Period.—Down to the reign of Elizabeth it cannot be said that Poor Laws, in our sense of the word (i.e. measures for the relief of destitution), existed at all; they might more fittingly be called laws against the poor and the rights of labour. The attempt was made persistently for 250 years, so far as the passing of repressive and penal laws could accomplish it, to reduce the labourer to the state of servitude from which it is but fair to remember he was but just emerging. To carry out this object he was confined to his place of birth; he was compelled to work for wages fixed, sometimes by law (e.g. that he should accept the current wages of the last five or six years), sometimes by justices, themselves employers of labour, every half-year according to the price of provisions; and if, from any vague idea of bettering his condition, he wandered abroad in search of work at the highest attainable price, he rendered himself liable to barbarous punishments (mentioned in the last chapter), which there is some reason for believing were not very commonly inflicted. At any rate, each successive Act testified to the failure of the attempt, “notwithstanding the good statutes before made,” and we may therefore content ourselves with one illustration of the spirit that governed the whole series. The Act of Henry IV., passed in 1405, recites that the law preventing the removal of labourers into large towns was evaded by the practice of apprenticing quite young children to divers crafts within cities and boroughs, "so that there is so great scarcity of labourers and other servants of husbandry that the GENTLEMEN and other people of the realm be greatly impoverished;" which practice it then proceeds to forbid (except the parent have property in the borough), upon pain of forfeiture of the indentures, of one year's imprisonment, and of fine levied upon the parent at the king's pleasure, and upon the employer to the amount of one hundred shillings.

As is commonly the case, things were at the darkest before the dawn. At no time were the vagrancy laws more severe or more severely administered than in the reign of Henry VIII., when, as the modern undergraduate may like to know, his predecessors swelled the number of "valiant rogues," under the title of "Oxford and Cambridge scholars that go about begging." But during this time of social dislocation and religious strife the labourer did but share the fate which befell all that was best and worthiest in the nation. It is more pleasant and not less profitable to observe that the tide of amendment was already setting strongly in, and that the struggle between the old and the new spirit, which was nowhere more clearly marked than in the treatment of the indigent, was ended by the victory of the latter, sooner perhaps in England than in other countries. The older spirit was still represented by the enactment of the old ferocious laws against "sturdy vagabonds;" but so early as 1536 the first distinction was drawn between "poor impotent, sick, and diseased people, not being able to work, who may be provided for, holpen, and relieved," and "such as be lusty, who, having their limbs strong enough to labour, may be daily kept in continual labour, whereby every one of them may get their own living with their own hands." To carry out the first object the clergy were to exhort the people to charitable offerings, and were to keep a book to show how the money raised was expended. The idea thus started spread rapidly. In 1551 it was enacted that in order to provide for the "impotent, feeble, and lame, WHO ARE POOR IN VERY DEED," collectors of alms at church on Sundays should be appointed; that, in case of refusal, the Bishop is to send for the recusant to expostulate with him, and—by a later Act—should bind him over to appear before the Justices, who, after "charitably and gently persuading him," should themselves levy a tax upon him at their discretion. But it is satisfactory to think that all throughout the reign of Elizabeth the "poor in very deed" felt more and more the effects of that growing spirit of humanity which was distilled from that splendid company of men who gathered round her throne. A register of impotent folk was to be kept, and a convenient dwelling-place found for them; officers, under the name of collectors, overseers, governors, censors, wardens, were appointed to relieve them; provision was made for maintenance by relations, the case of illegitimate children being expressly included; houses of correction were ordered to be built, and "stuff" for work provided. So that the definite establishment of a system of poor relief in 1601 was only the completion of previous measures by the addition of a compulsory rating instead of voluntary or quasi-voluntary contributions. And it is, we think, clear beyond reasonable doubt that it was the growing sense of what the nation owed to itself, the mere consideration of natural humanity and collective responsibility, that was the immediate and efficient cause of the institution of Poor Laws, as we now understand them.

The Second Period.—The Act of 1601, the “foundation and text-book of English Poor Law,” dealt with the authorities, the funds, the recipients, and the methods of poor relief. As to the first of these, it was ordered that two or three overseers were to be nominated in every parish in Easter week, under the hand and seal of Justices of the Peace, and were to take order with consent of the justices for carrying out the Act. As to funds they were to raise weekly or otherwise such sums of money as they thought fit by taxation of every inhabitant, the parson heading the list—a post of honour and of burden which, owing to the nature of his income, he occupies to this day. In the case of poor parishes a rate in aid to be levied upon the Hundred or county was permitted, but not, it should seem, acted upon in practice. As to the recipients and methods of relief, a distinction was drawn between children whose parents could not keep them, persons able to work but without occupation, and the impotent, e.g. the lame, old, and blind—the first were to be apprenticed, the second set to work (“stock” e.g. of flax being provided by the overseers), the third relieved. As to repression, liability to maintain was extended to grandparents, and it was taken for granted that a person’s right to relief would arise in his birthplace.

The wisdom of the Act is almost as remarkable for what it omitted as for what it prescribed. It took notice of the only two classes who come legitimately within the province of Poor Laws,—the idle who will not, and the impotent who cannot, work; and with these it dealt by methods simple indeed and vague, but essentially true in principle. The “industrious poor,” as Sir Matthew Hale expressly noticed, were not, and were never intended to be (as they never ought to be) included within its scope; while vagabonds were left to the criminal law, the labour test being adopted for persons resident in their parish and able to work if they pleased: it was only in case of refusal to work that this class was to be committed to prison. One hundred years afterwards, in 1696, a preamble of an Act in the reign of William III. shows how clearly the statesmen of that time understood the meaning of the Act to be as we have stated it: “That the money raised only for the relief of such as are as well impotent as poor may not be misapplied and consumed by idle, sturdy, and disorderly beggars.” And so long as the principle of this Act was adhered to, which, with one lamentable exception, was the case for one hundred and sixty years, the working of the Poor Laws was fairly successful.

We shall give three instances of the chief alterations which were made during this period: The first concerns the authorities by whom relief was to be administered. In 1691 an Act recites that overseers, upon frivolous pretences, but chiefly for their own private ends, gave relief to what persons and number they think fit, by which means the rates are daily increased, contrary to the true intent of the Statute of the 43d of Elizabeth

The remedy provided was the very sensible one that a register should be kept of paupers with the amount of the relief given them ; that this register should be produced once a year at a vestry meeting ; that the cases should be examined into, and a new list made out for the ensuing year as the parishioners shall allow ; and that no one else during that year should "receive collection" (i.e. relief) except by authority of one Justice, or by order of the Bench of Justices at Quarter Sessions.

From this last clause, or rather from the perversion of its plain meaning, sprang "all our woes." For it appears from an Act of George I., some thirty years later, that a practice had sprung up of Justices ordering relief to any applicants who came to them without the knowledge of the parish officers, or upon false or frivolous pretences, "whereby they have obtained relief" (this phrase is characteristic ; the blame was not, as in the case of the overseers, attached to the giver, for in those days Justices could do no wrong), "which hath greatly contributed to the increase of the rates." Unfortunately the usurpation was not promptly stopped, but it was merely ordered that the applicant should be required to show that he had first of all applied for relief to the parish authorities, who should then be summoned to show cause why relief should not be given. Hence, in the words of the Report of 1834, which lays the blame of most of the harm that followed upon this perversion of the law, "The Act which was passed to remedy this abuse" (i.e. of the Justices' interference) enabled the Justice, on the pauper's statement of some matter which the Justice should judge to be a cause for relief, to summon the overseers to show cause why relief should not be given, and to order such relief as he should think fit—an order against which there was no appeal.” The results of this enactment we shall see presently.

The second point concerns the important article of indoor-relief, and that, too, as a test of destitution. Owing to the increase of expenditure the idea of building houses for the reception of paupers became popular, though it was mixed with the notion, so plausible in itself, but so wrong in principle and disastrous in effects, that the paupers could be put to remunerative labour. In 1696 John Locke had suggested the establishment of working schools, and the provision of materials for the employment of labourers at the public cost. Next year, at the instance of a Mr. John Carey, a workhouse was built at Bristol by special Act of Parliament, and being used as a test of destitution produced in a short time such excellent results that the example was followed by Worcester, Hull, Norwich, and other places. And in the Act of George I. above mentioned it was enacted that parishes might either singly, or in unions of two or more, provide houses for the reception of the indigent, and that “NO POOR WHO REFUSED TO BE LODGED AND KEPT IN SUCH HOUSES SHOULD BE ENTITLED TO ASK OR RECEIVE PAROCHIAL RELIEF.” The immediate effect of this measure was, as might have been expected, satisfactory. The expenditure which was estimated (perhaps too highly) in 1698 at £819,000 was returned in 1750 at £619,000 in spite of the increase of population. But after the zeal of the first founders had passed away, and the evils incident to a system of management without central supervision had crept in, the tide of evil soon set in again, and in the next period in 1776 the expenditure was £1,521,000, and in 1785, upon an average of three years, the enormous sum of £1,912,000.

Upon the whole, however, it must be said that during the second period, i.e. down to 1760, the working of the Poor Laws was fairly successful. It is true the expenditure was increasing, just as it did in our own time some twelve years ago, but it had been partially met, as it was by ourselves, by increasing the rigour of the workhouse test. And it is to be noted that the reign of George II. is fixed upon by the best authorities as the time when the condition of the working classes was more prosperous than it had been before or has been since—until comparatively recent days. On the other hand, the germs of future evil had been already sown, and were further aggravated by the third change in the law which we are next to indicate.¹

This third point concerns the law of settlement which,—not, however, by any effect of the Act of Elizabeth,—was made during this period intolerably harsh and oppressive. Philosophy knows how to make excuses for mistakes, or even for what appears to us wickedness, when it grows out of the spirit of the age in its advance towards a better state; but philosophy is thrown away upon such a reign as that of the second Charles, the wickedness of which was due to a deliberate reaction against all that had been best and worthiest in preceding reigns. In the sphere of Poor Laws another and not unsuccessful attempt was made to reduce the working classes to practical servitude. By an Act of 1662, itself a confused and illogical medley, it was enacted at the instance chiefly of the members for London and Westminster, that at the complaint of the overseers the Justices might, within forty days of any person's coming to dwell in a strange parish, order him to be removed back to his own place of settlement, unless he could give security to the new parish against becoming chargeable to it,—that is to say, persons could be removed not merely when they were chargeable, but upon the chance that they might become so. The reason for this almost incredible violation of the rights of liberty was, that “poor people are not restrained from going from one parish to another, and therefore do endeavour to settle themselves in those parishes where there is the best stock,” etc. etc. By this Act it may with truth be said that the iron of slavery entered into the soul of the English labourer, and made only £37 : 0 : 10, and twenty years afterwards it had reached the sum of £142 : 10 : 1, payments for labour having become much more common. The accounts are always passed by some half-dozen parishioners, and signed as “allowed” by two Justices. I may perhaps be permitted, under shelter of a note, to express my firm conviction that this old system of management, plus a workhouse for each locality, supported by the county rates and used as a test, plus also a prohibition to give out-relief to the able-bodied, and subjected to strict supervision and audit, would be at this moment, IN COUNTRY PLACES, a better and more effective administration than the present one, necessary as that had become in 1834.

him cling to his parish as a shipwrecked sailor to his raft. From the very first it was the fruitful parent of fraud, injustice, lavish expenditure, ill-will, and endless litigation. So early as 1685 an Act of James II. recites "that poor people at their first coming into a parish do commonly conceal themselves" (what a picture for a free country!), and enacts that the forty days of power of removal shall be counted from the time they give notice to the overseers of their residence in the parish, which notice was in 1691 ordered to be read in church, so that the fugitive might be hunted down by any who objected to his presence. The same Act of 1691 did, however, lessen the burden by establishing derivative settlements, such as payment of taxes for one year, serving an annual office, hiring for a year, and apprenticeship. In connection with this last, and as a specimen of the spirit of fraudulent selfishness which the law of settlement naturally aroused in different parishes, it may be mentioned that in 1758 a law was passed to put down a very base arrangement, whereby "great numbers of persons have been unwarily bound apprentices by certain deeds, not indented (i.e. not by legal indenture), by which many of them have suffered great loss and damage on account of their having been refused a settlement in such parish where they have been bound, and have been removed to the parish where their last legal settlement was before such apprenticeship." It is indeed a surprising fact that in England some 130 years ago a man should be driven by force of law from the place where he had served his time as an apprentice, and intended to pursue his trade in peace.

The Third Period.—The administration of Poor Law during the seventy years of this period may be described as the exact antithesis to the first. In that, as we have noted, the main object of legislation was to restrict the wages of the labourer for the benefit of the employer; in this the object was to maintain the rate of (agricultural) wages at a certain level, no matter whether the employer could afford to give it or not. An opinion got abroad that it was the duty of the State to provide what the State might deem a proper subsistence for the working classes, the origin and fallacy of which have been neatly exposed in the following “syllogism” :—

“It is the duty of the Legislature to provide for all the poor (i.e. the destitute).”

“All the labouring classes are poor (i.e. without property).”

Therefore “It is the duty of the Legislature to provide for all the labouring classes.”

The first definite embodiment of this opinion in the law of the land was made in 1795, under circumstances that show how commonly accepted the notion had become. The nation was entering into the agony of the great war with France, prices were rising beyond all past experience, and to keep the people in good humour at any cost had become a State necessity. And so, on May 6, 1795, at Speenhamland, near Newbury (the date and place deserve to be solemnly recorded), the Berkshire magistrates issued an edict in which they declare that they will in future make certain calculations and allowances for the relief of all poor and industrious men and their families, and then proceeded to fix a scale of relief proportioned to the price of wheat and the number of the family. This is the celebrated "Speenhamland Act of Parliament," which was immediately followed in many counties, and much more cheerfully obeyed than is wont to be the case with the Acts of its more august rival at Westminster. Not but what the Berkshire legislators were merely giving practical shape to the opinions and proposals, which, though they did not pass into laws, show what was the state of feeling in the House of Commons itself. Mr. Whitbread introduced a Bill authorising Justices to fix a minimum of wages, as before (so certain is the law of reaction and retaliation) they had attempted to fix a maximum; and subsequently he complained that upon searching the statute-book he could find no law to COMPEL THE FARMERS TO DO THEIR DUTY. Mr. Fox thought that the magistrates should protect the poor from the injustice of grasping employers. Mr. Lechmere opined that no agricultural labourer could support himself and his family with comfort. Mr. Pitt, who evinced a much profounder knowledge of the subject, and who denounced the law of settlement as interfering with the free circulation of labour, and proposed an annual Poor Law budget to prevent abuses, nevertheless introduced a Bill for authorising allowances out of the public rates, including the present of a cow or other domestic animal.

The prevailing ignorance of economical laws is not altogether excusable, for Adam Smith was but just dead; Bentham was alive, and criticised Pitt's proposals with trenchant severity; Burke (who, however, died in 1797), at least knew better, as did probably Pitt himself. But it is a melancholy tribute to the power of sentimental error (palliated by the circumstances of the times) that all the injury inflicted upon the labouring classes by the deliberately hostile legislation of Plantagenet or Tudor statesmen was but as dust in the balance compared with what they suffered from the benevolent measures of some of the best men that have ever ruled in England. As it has been well expressed : "The poor might well say, We can deal with our enemies, only save us from our friends."

The Poor Law Acts passed during this period are too numerous to be even mentioned, and yet they bear no proportion to the number of propositions made and the amount of discussion evoked. Roughly speaking, the Acts during the eighteenth century part of this seventy-five years were intended to give expression to the new policy of sentimental care for the interests of the poor ; while those of the second part were some feeble and illusive attempts to grapple with evils, by the growing extent of which popular opinion was excited, and at length seriously alarmed. We can but allude to some of the more important of them.¹

We may remark first that the beginning of George III.'s reign was creditably distinguished by a number of measures for the benefit of the working people, which, though partaking more of a charitable or benevolent character than of the nature of Poor Laws, ought to be noticed. Thus pauper children were ordered to be sent not less than five miles out of London to be brought up, and "guardians" appointed to look after them; the duration of apprenticing was diminished from 24 to 21 years of age; parish authorities were punished for making payments in bad money to the poor; regulations were passed for friendly societies, hospitals, lying-in hospitals, penitentiaries, and the apprenticing of children to the king's ships; and finally, by an Act which shows the spirit of the age at its best, an Act of Elizabeth against building cottages in rural places (itself at the time a singularly well meaning measure, for it provided that each new cottage should have four acres of land attached to it, and be inhabited by one family alone) was repealed upon the ground that it "laid the industrious poor under great difficulties to procure habitations, and in other respects has been found inconvenient to the labouring part of the nation." This sounds plausible enough, but we may suspect that some selfish interests in the way of settlement were at the bottom of it, and certainly the prohibition against overcrowding was repealed.

The principal Poor Law Acts of the close of the eighteenth century concerned the formation of Unions, building and inspection of workhouses, regulations for apprenticing, rating, and the definite establishment of out-relief, to which may be added an alteration in the law of bastardy, tending also to the relaxation of morals.

The first of these was Gilbert's Act in 1782. It recites the great increase of expenditure, and the increased sufferings of the poor notwithstanding, laying the blame upon the parochial authorities, from whom it proceeds to take away the administration of relief in all parishes which should adopt the new Act. Power was given to form Unions or Incorporations by voluntary arrangement of adjacent parishes, and to build a workhouse for the Union. With the customary confidence in the Justices, it was enacted that they should appoint visitors and guardians; the latter being paid, and, therefore, resembling the modern relieving officer, and being under the control of the Justices and visitors (themselves supposed to be of the social standing of the Justices), by whom the poor relief administration was carried on. Sixty-seven Incorporations were thus formed, some of which, by an anomaly only possible in England, survive in name to this day, e.g. at Oxford, and have caused a good deal of trouble. The guardians were expressly forbidden to send any but the "impotent" to the workhouse, and by an ever-recurring fallacy were ordered to find suitable employment for the able-bodied near their own homes. Four years later returns procured by the same Mr. Gilbert showed that the cost of relief had risen from £1,529,780 in 1776, to an average of £2,004,238 for 1783-5, being an increase of £474,458, or more than 30 per cent.

In 1790 inspection of poorhouses by the Justices was ordered, or by other persons, such as clergymen and doctors, under their authority. Particular complaint was made of infectious diseases, and the absence of discipline and classification was already producing the abuses that were found to exist forty years later.

Fresh regulations concerning parish apprenticing were made in 1792, by which penalties were enacted for misuse, such misuse having been in part occasioned by a deliberate attempt to get rid by discharge of the apprentices whom the masters had unwillingly received. Perhaps no part of the old Poor Law was more prolific of ill-will, craft, and cruelty than this.

The inexcusable rigour of the law of settlement, which had not escaped the generous indignation of Burke, was dealt with in 1795 by an Act which finally forbade the removal of persons from any parish until they had become actually chargeable to the rates, and which in all cases enabled the Justices to suspend an order of removal if the pauper were unfit to travel, because, as the Act recites, persons were often removed in time of sickness to the danger of their lives. Glimpses like these show what hard-hearted cruelty had crept into the administration of the old Poor Law, and how natural it is for well meaning but mistaken kindness to produce in practice the very opposite results to what it intends.

The decisively fatal step of legalising out-relief to the able-bodied, and in aid of wages, was taken in 1796. It will be remembered that an Act of 1722 had established a kind of workhouse test, and this was now formally rescinded upon the ground stated in language now become familiar, "That it was inconvenient and oppressive, inasmuch as it often prevents an industrious poor person from receiving such occasional relief as is best suited to his particular case, and in certain cases holds out conditions of relief injurious to the comfort and domestic situation and happiness of such poor persons." Accordingly, the parish authorities were empowered to give relief to any industrious person at his own residence in case of sickness or distress—distress being practically defined as the not having an income which the Justices thought sufficient. And it was expressly added that refusal to enter a poorhouse should not be a cause for withholding relief. Moreover, the Justices were authorised to order relief for a certain time to persons who “are entitled to ask and receive such relief at their own houses.” The result, of course, was that the “bread-scales” became a sort of bye-law in every county, and that what the farmer did not give in wages was made up from the rates. The labourers, being no longer paid according to their earnings, rapidly deteriorated, and it is significant that in one town (Winslow) so early as 1795, they are described as having become “very lazy and imperious.”

In 1801 recourse was once more had to the infallibility of Justices, who were made the rating, as they had already become the relieving, authority. They were authorised not merely as before to quash an illegal rate, but to amend it by altering names and amounts. And in order, as the Act passed two years later declares, “to render Justices of the Peace more safe in the execution of their duty,” the penalty for an illegal decision to be recovered from a Justice was limited to 2d., unless it was plain that he was actuated by improper motives. Of these no one accuses the English magistracy as a body, nor even of consciously yielding to self-interest in adjudicating upon matters in which they were perhaps the most interested persons present, but they were placed in a position of antagonism to the Poor Law officials which made impartiality impossible, and duties were imposed upon them which it was out of the question that they could have the opportunity or the information for discharging properly.

The last touch to the picture of industrial demoralisation was added in 1809 and 1810, when two Bastardy Acts were passed with the object—still from the same sentimental feeling—of favouring the woman at the expense of the man. It is difficult to believe, but it is nevertheless the truth, that by these Acts any woman, before her child was born, could, upon her mere unsupported oath, cause any man to be sent to prison unless he could indemnify the parish against any expense in respect of the child said to be his. This marks the lowest point reached by Poor Law legislation, and as usual, the consequences to the character and position of the persons, i.e. in this case the women, whom it was desired to protect from the ill effects of their own conduct, were in the long run far more injurious than to the men, just as the labourer suffered far more from legislative benevolence than the employer.

After this the nation could but look on in a kind of paralysis at the inordinate growth of moral abuses, of industrial disaster, of ruinous expenditure. The expenditure doubled itself between the years 1783, when it stood at £2,004,238, and 1803, when it had arisen to £4,267,965, gradually increasing till it reached in 1817 its maximum, represented by the enormous sum of £7,870,801 in a population of about 11,000,000. Curiously enough this was about the sum reached in 1871, when the population was about doubled, and all the costly arrangements for asylums, infirmaries, and district schools were included.

But dissatisfaction grew with the cost; and discussion by competent persons, of whom Mr. Malthus was the chief, prepared the public mind for a thorough reform upon rational and, what was a new feature in English legislation of that time, scientific principles. An able report of a Committee of the House of Commons in 1817 laid a finger upon the worst blots, and made a variety of useful proposals. The only practical results of any importance were the constitution of select vestries for the administration of relief, who were instructed to distinguish between the "deserving and the idle, extravagant, and profligate poor." Assistant overseers were to be appointed, and the power of Justices to order relief was somewhat curtailed in places where select vestries had been established. Further facilities were created for building workhouses, and for the first time relief might be given on loan. Several places adopted the provisions of this Act, and set an example of what could be done in the way of reform. Amongst these Southwell and Bingham, Cookham and Hatfield, deserve to be mentioned.

We bring this chapter to a close with the mention of an Act of 1828 to provide for the care of pauper lunatics. As there is no class in the world more deserving of compassion and more in need of public relief, it shows how capricious and untrustworthy is a policy directed merely by sentiment, that this was the first occasion in which the State made special provision for this unfortunate class of human beings. As to the rest, this was the state of things down to the reform of 1834. The public funds were regarded as a regular part of the maintenance of the labouring people engaged in agriculture, and were administered by more than 2000 Justices, 15,000 sets of overseers, and 15,000 vestries, acting always independently of each other, and very commonly in opposition, quite uncontrolled, and ignorant of the very rudiments of political economy. And the £7,000,000 or more of public money was the price paid for converting the free labourer into a slave, without reaping even such returns as slavery can give. The able-bodied pauper was obliged to live where the law of settlement placed him, to receive the income which the neighbouring magistrates thought sufficient, to work for the master and in the way which the parish authorities prescribed, and very often to marry the wife they found for him. He was, in short, as has been truly said of him, a "work of art, and not the natural offspring of the English race."

CHAPTER IV.

POOR LAW REFORM.

IN February 1834 was published perhaps the most remarkable and startling document to be found in the whole range of English, perhaps, indeed, of all, social history. It was the Report upon the administration and practical operation of the Poor Laws by the Commissioners who had been appointed to investigate the subject. In the list of nine gentlemen who composed the Commission there is not to be found a single ornamental name, the Bishop of London (Blomfield), who heads the list, having a deserved reputation for practical sagacity and powers of business. Mr. Sturges Bourne represented the older Poor Law reformers, while the names of Mr. Nassau Senior and Mr. Edwin Chadwick (the future Secretary to the Board) are better known to more recent times. It was their rare good fortune not only to lay bare the existence of abuses and trace them to their roots, but also to propound and enforce the remedies by which they might be cured. It is seldom indeed, that the conditions of so vast and sweeping a reform are found co-existing. The evils were gross and alarming; there was a ministry that had been carried into power by an outburst of reforming zeal; above all, there was a readiness to be guided by principles of purely scientific legislation, which at a later period gave us Free Trade, Financial Reform, Colonial Administration, Tithe Commutation, and the beginning of Law Reform, and for which the exigencies of parliamentary government, and the overflowings of passion and sentiment, allow but too small and limited a scope. Their success was therefore at once inevitable and deserved.

The Report opens with these words :—"It is now our painful duty to report that the fund which the 43d of Elizabeth directed to be employed in setting to work children and persons capable of labour, but using no daily trade, and in the necessary relief of the impotent, is applied to purposes opposed to the letter, and still more to the spirit, of that law, and destructive to the morals of that most numerous class, and to the welfare of all." It is a duty, which, even at this distance of time, is also painful, to give the briefest possible sketch of the results of their investigation. And this not merely because it is the only way of understanding the need and nature of the remedies they proposed, but because the Report ought to be known (by students of social science in the original) by the general public as a picture of the condition to which a mistaken course of legislation, together with obstructive and selfish ignorance, can reduce the greatest nations at the very height of their power and fame.

I. THE OFFICIALS BY WHOM THE POOR LAW WAS THEN ADMINISTERED.—These were the overseers, vestries, and magistrates. The former were taken from the shop-keeping or farming class, and served not even for a year but for six, three, or even two months, so that they had no opportunity, even if desirous, of introducing regularity into the administration. The office was disagreeable, unpopular, and unpaid, and specially obnoxious to busy men. There were no books kept by which the cost of the relief, or the reasons of giving it, could be examined, the only check being that of submitting the mere items of moneys paid to the vestry, and getting them allowed by the Justices. Against partiality, favouritism, and jobbing there was no check; against embezzlement very little. If the overseers refused relief, the pauper could summon them before the magistrate, whose order they must obey; but a more dreaded tribunal at the beer-shop, with a more stringent procedure in the way of arson and violence, was at hand to compel obedience. They were "as a body found wholly incompetent," "anxious to get through the year with as little unpopularity and trouble as possible." Their duties were delegated to wives, children, and shopmen. Tradesmen were obliged to yield to demands for doles upon pain of losing custom, nor were assaults at all uncommon. Lastly, in very many cases the men charged with these responsible duties were barely able to read and write.¹

In answer to an inquiry why a shilling was paid for tolling the bell at every pauper's death, the overseer replied in a whisper, "Why, sir, the clerk is a dreadful man, and always threatens to fight me whenever I wants to stop that ere charge."

The vestries, whether open or representative, were of the same class as the overseers, though with less sense of responsibility and more pride of office. They rendered no account, were not obliged to keep any record of the members present, or of their speeches and votes, and had a direct interest in giving relief in aid of earnings. In particular, a dead set was made at the tithe owners, and there were several cases in which wages were lowered, and rates increased for the express purpose of throwing

It is somewhat unfair to quote the following story, for the heroine of it, if she be alive,—as, for her praiseworthy exertions to do her duty, she fully deserves to be,—would still be far below three score years and ten; but as a picture of the times it is irresistible. The Assistant Commissioner “found himself in a carpeted parlour, seated at a large oak table, with the parish accountant by his side. She was the yeoman’s sister, a fine, ruddy, healthy, blooming, bouncing girl of eighteen. As her plump, red finger went down the items, it was constantly deserting its official duties to lay aside a profusion of long black ringlets, which occasionally gamboled before her visitor’s eyes. She had evidently taken great pains to separate, as cleverly as she could, the motley claimants on the parish purse, just as her brother had divided his lambs from his pigs, and his sheep from his cows. She had one long list of ‘labourers with families;’ ‘widows’ were demurely placed in one corner of her ledger; ‘cesses’ stood in another; vagrants or trampers crossed one page; those receiving constant relief sat still in another; at last the accountant came to two very long lists—one was composed of what she called low women; the other, veiled by her curls, she modestly muttered were ‘hillyjittimites.’”

The governor of a large workhouse was asked to show his “dietary.” He slowly led the way to the dining-hall, and, pointing to the paupers’ dining-table, said, “Here it is, sir.”

Another did not know how many inmates there were in the house, for whom he was, at the moment, serving up dinner, but was quite sure that an old blind pauper—one Mrs. Smith—who “had such a capital memory,” could answer the question, which she at once did.

part of the payment of wages upon their heads.¹ A common remark was, "Why should the farmers keep the labourers to save the gentry and householders?" A competent witness declared that the farmers would rather pay 75 per cent in poor rates, and 25 per cent in wages, than in the inverse proportions. Scandalous scenes at vestry meetings were common, and in the larger places the higher classes ceased to attend.

The real pivot, however, upon which the system turned was the Justices. Their position was that of charitable gentlemen to whom the oppressed poor could appeal against the tyranny of the overseers. In the first place, they fixed the "scale" of income that every labourer ought to have, adjusting it with great nicety to the price of bread and the size of his family. In the Speenhamland "scale," if the gallon of bread was 1s., a single man's income was 3s., husband and wife 4s. 6d., and 1s. 6d. for every child up to seven, making 15s. for the whole family. And against this order there was of course no appeal. In cases of dispute a pauper could select his own tribunal—that is, the magistrate with the best character for charity, which often meant timidity or desire of popularity—and appear before him as an injured man dragging his oppressor to justice. It is needless to say that the magistrate could not have the same means of ascertaining a man's earnings as the parish officers, and was easily imposed upon by false representations. The paupers would drag the overseer to a favourite magistrate, passing by the house of another not supposed to be lenient, "would beat him as usual," and return in triumph with music and favours. Of one magistrate it was said that it would pay the parish to give him £100 a year not to act.

Several pages of the Report are taken up with an account of an extraordinary state of things at the Worship Street Police Court, where the overseers and the magistrate had fallen out. The latter insisted upon relief being given in every case, and declared that it was quite impossible to investigate the cases of forty or fifty paupers every day. The overseer retaliated by allowing himself to be summoned for fifty persons at once, and insisting upon each case being heard on its merits. After hearing the first few, the overseer, "seeing the magistrate getting angry," offered to take them into the house for the night, and departed, escorted by two beadles, and followed by his train of paupers, all of whom except ten or twelve slunk away before they reached the house, though they had sworn to the magistrate they were starving. By far the greater part were known bad characters. And this in London!

It is right to add that the Report (dealing in this respect much more gently with magistrates than overseers, for whom also excuses might be pleaded), expressly declares that there is no question as to their good intentions, and that their mistakes are due to misapprehension of the proper objects of the Poor Law, and to their unfitness, by reason of their social position and opportunities of investigating the cases, for the jurisdiction imposed upon them.

II. OUTDOOR RELIEF.—Six methods of giving out-relief were discovered by the commission.

(a) Relief in kind, consisting chiefly of payment of rent and of tickets for clothing and goods, most often at the shops of vestrymen and overseers.

(b) Relief without Labour.—This was a payment either of two or three shillings a week without conditions, or else a rather larger sum given upon condition that the labourers should be confined in a certain place, e.g. the Pound or gravel pit, or should attend a roll-call several times a day. The object appears partly to have labourers within call, if wanted; partly to make things disagreeable to them. The books of Hampton Poyle, a tiny village near Oxford, contain the following :—“Paid for men and boys standing in the Pound six days, £6 : 7s.

“W. Wheeler” standing in the Pound six days, 8s.

(c) Allowance.—This is the amount paid to make up the pauper's income to the “scale” approved by the justices. Sometimes the earnings were inquired into, more often payment was allowed for each child, under the title of “head money.” Very frequently the rate of wages was fixed at vestry meetings, with allowances to make it up. Labourers used to get married and go from the church to the overseer, and request to have a house found for them. A man might earn 21s. a fortnight and then apply to have the average made up for the month. Another man with six children could earn upon an average 9s. per week, but had only earned 5s. from his master and 2s. for work from the parish. He received as a matter of course 7s. 6d. across the pay table. “Bread money” was regarded as a right, and the wages supposed to be earned were calculated at the lowest rate paid in the district, so that a man might earn by special work £1 a week, and yet receive the extra as per scale.

Sometimes large earnings were made in the summer, and the whole parish came on to the rates in the winter. So thoroughly understood was it that the birth of a child entitled to the parish allowance, that the happy father would give notice to the overseer that the birth of a new little pauper might be expected in due time. If the case came before the magistrate, the regular enquiry was, "At what number does the allowance begin in your parish?"

(d) The Roundsman. — This system, which, from an antiquarian point of view, might be interesting as being a mixed survival of primitive communism and mediæval serfdom, consisted in the parish paying the farmers to employ the labourers. The parish sold the commodity of labour to the farmer, and made up the difference between his wages and the income supposed to be his due out of the rates. In one place there was a weekly sale, at which an eyewitness saw ten men knocked down to one farmer for 5s. It was called the ticket system, because the pauper received a ticket from the overseer as a warrant for the farmer to employ him at the cost of the parish. The "roundsman" often spent the day in going from house to house for employment, the farmers certifying that he had called at their houses, in order to justify the overseer in paying him.

(e) Parish Employment. — This (which was the only legal form of out-relief¹) was not frequently adopted, though it was the only reasonable form that out-relief could take. It meant the employment of labourers on the roads or in the workhouse, and it was obviously easier to give relief gratuitously than to exact labour for it. Moreover, the necessity of associating the paupers in large gangs worked very disastrous results. Most of the day was spent in idleness, and an attempt to put a superintendent over the work was promptly met by a successful threat to drown him. The paupers claimed a right (before the Justices) to work less hours for the parish than for private employers, and in many places received higher pay than they could earn as wages. If a man showed signs of doing his task work, the obvious remark by his companions was, "You must have your money whether you work or not."

(f) The Labour Rate.—This was an agreement that each ratepayer should employ at a fixed rate so many "settled" labourers, or else pay the amount of their wages to the overseer. In one case the names of the occupiers were put in a bag and drawn out by each labourer, who had then to work for that master for the week at 10s., and for another the next; the farmer, of course, being under strong inducement to discharge his regular workmen, in order to find work for the labourers thus quartered upon him. In one parish the rector was required to employ $62\frac{1}{2}$ men at 10s. per week, besides his poor rate of £420, an amount which was about double the value of his benefice.

We shall, however, endeavour presently to group together the various abuses to which the system of out-relief gave rise; but before doing so, we must mention one matter by which the evils of Poor Law were then, as they always have been, greatly aggravated.

III. SETTLEMENT.—Although the Poor Law administrators paid little attention to law or principles, there was one fixed rule that was never transgressed. They never gave permanent relief to labourers who had no settlement in the parish, nor to their own settled people if they were residing elsewhere. The reason of course was, that each parish, though willing to pay rates in aid of wages for its own supposed benefit, was not very likely to be willing to pay the wages of persons employed elsewhere. Every labourer was therefore bound to his own parish, not as in the preceding century by the law, i.e. the operation of the Act of Charles II., for that, as we have seen, had been repealed; but by the fixed practice of Poor Law administration, which gave him large "allowances" and other payments, only upon condition that his settlement gave him a claim upon the parish for relief. There was thus great need that the law of settlement should be as simple and intelligible as possible; instead of which the ingenuity of the law itself never accomplished a more perfect network of intricacies and difficulties. The explanation, so characteristic of English legislation, is this: We have seen that the Act of Charles II. allowed overseers to remove any new-comer within 40 days of his first appearance in the parish. We have seen, also, that to mitigate the rigour of this enactment, an Act of William and Mary allowed derivative settlements, such as apprenticeships, hiring for a year, renting a tenement, and so on. Then came the Act of George III., which did away with the rigour of the Act of Charles by making persons irremovable until they became actually chargeable. Logically, the secondary modes of settlement should also have been abolished at that time also, but they were retained, causing infinite trouble and legal difficulties. For as each new settlement, when acquired, destroyed the old one, every effort was made by parish officers to prevent one from being obtained, or to establish one elsewhere. Here is an illustration which seems hardly credible. A man leaves parish A at the age of 15, goes to London, lives there many years, has a family, becomes destitute there, having acquired no settlement, owing to his work being upon jobs. He is passed back to parish A, which discovers that he was hired as a groom for one year before going to London, and lived with his master six weeks at a seaside place in Wales, when, if it could be shown that he slept at least 40 nights in the hotel, he would become chargeable to that parish B,—neither A nor B having had anything whatever to do with him for 30 or 40 years.

We shall now endeavour to sum up the actual effects of Poor Law administration upon the welfare of the people, and, merely owing to the necessity of imposing some limit, shall confine ourselves to a dozen heads.

(1.) The burden upon rateable property.—The typical, though, it must also be admitted, the extreme case quoted by the Report is that of Cholesbury, in Buckinghamshire, where the rates, which had been £10 : 11s. in 1801, were proceeding in 1832 at the amount of £367, when they ceased, owing to the impossibility of collecting more. The poor rate had swallowed up the whole value of the land, which was going out of cultivation. The paupers meanwhile were supported by rates in aid and voluntary benevolence; and it is obvious that however small might be the actual confiscation of property in that village, it must, by the nature of the case, spread, since every acre that ceased to support the inhabitants threw fresh burdens upon those that were left to do so. But when we remember that the amount raised in poor rates was over £6,000,000, we can imagine that the margin between possession and confiscation was growing perilously small. Farms were in all districts without tenants, simply because it was found impossible to pay rates that were perhaps £1 per acre. And the general opinion as to the approach of absolute ruin was thus graphically expressed: "The eighteen-penny children will eat up this parish in ten years more, unless some relief be afforded us."

(2.) The burden upon the poorer ratepayers.—Their case was hard indeed. In many instances they earned less and worked harder than the paupers whom they were supporting in idleness and comparative luxury. It sometimes happened that the overseer called for rates upon men who had at that moment nothing to eat in the house. As one witness said, "Poor is the diet of the pauper; poorer is the diet of the small ratepayer; poorest is the diet of the independent labourer."

(3.) The burden upon independent labourers.—Perhaps no more really shocking result of the system was than that industrious men who were trying to maintain themselves could not obtain employment. In attempting to abolish the law of nature, which punishes improvidence and idleness, the Poor Law succeeded in abolishing that other law which rewards virtue and thrift. Repeated cases occur in which men of excellent character were superseded by paupers who, as they must be maintained somehow, it was thought good should be set to work. If an industrious man was known to have laid by money he would be left without work till his savings were spent.

Sometimes such men were discharged till they were reduced to the desired state. Men who deferred marriage had not the same chance of obtaining employment as youths with families. Not many years before this date to be a "parish bird" was accounted disgraceful; not to be so was now thought foolish. Here is a specimen of indignant rustic eloquence,—“The paupers blame me for what I do. They say to me, ‘What are you working for?’ I say, ‘For myself.’ They say, ‘You are only doing it to save the parish, and if you didn’t do it you would get the same as another man has, and would get the money for smoking your pipe and doing nothing.’ ’Tis a hard thing for a man like me.”

(4.) The burden upon non-employers.—We have already noticed that the poor rate being levied upon house property and tithes was pro tanto a rate paid by other than employers in aid of wages. The same thing obtained in manufactories, where employers sometimes received annual payments from the parish for keeping their paupers at work. To take an instance. At Nottingham the masters reduced the rate of wages for stocking making, giving their men a certificate to the effect that they were only earning (say) 6s. a week. The men then applied to the parish, who allowed them 4s. or 5s. more.¹

(5.) The demoralization of the officials.—“The rental” (it has been said—Edinburgh Review, No. 149) “of a pauperized parish was like the revenue of the Sultan of

Turkey—a prey of which every administrator hoped to get a share. The owner of cottage property found in the parish a liberal and solvent tenant, and the petty shopkeeper and publican attended the vestry to vote allowances to his customers and debtors.” The payment of rent was so universal (to prevent homes being broken up and families thrown into the workhouse) that a brisk speculation sprang up in cottage property of a low type. This was aggravated by the custom of not rating the smaller tenements, a practice that became fruitful of abuse and jobbery. But the reader must imagine all this, or find it in the Report for himself.

(6.) Chicanery and litigation.—This was a direct consequence of the law of settlement. Cottages were pulled down, and the inhabitants bribed to sleep in adjoining parishes. Fraudulent hirings were made for 364 days, so as to break settlement by annual hiring. Apprentices were bound out in other parishes so as to shift the settlement. Men were bribed to marry women of the worst character for the same purpose, and the overseers were accustomed to negotiate marriages where a child was expected, the father of which (as the woman would say) does not belong to you. Landlords pulled down sometimes every cottage on their estate so as to compel surrounding parishes to pay for the work done on their property. In one case a proprietor of a parish hired a farm in the parish of Ely, and sent his own people to work on it in yearly batches, and then turned them off with a settlement gained in that parish. And many cases of similar abuses are reported. Fraud and perjury abounded.

(7.) Disorganization of industry.—This was also due to settlement. Any chance event—say the establishment or closing of a manufacture—changed the proportion between the settled labourers and the number required for work in that locality. And Irish labourers had opportunities of obtaining work over Englishmen, because the latter did not dare to leave their places of settlement, which “appeared to them like leaving their freeholds or heirlooms.” Instances are recorded where steady men without families declined tempting situations that would have doubled their income, for fear of losing their settlement.

(8.) Deterioration of labour.—The loss of farmers, by whom so much must be trusted to the care of their workmen (as contrasted with manufactories, where there is more superintendence), was set down as enormous. This points to the truth that the agricultural labourer ought to be, and perhaps, in spite of appearance, is, the most skilled labourer there is. The conditions of his work are such as that, if they drag the man down, the work itself elevates the workman. Very much must be left to his care, his experience, and his trustworthiness. But not only had he become unskilful and dishonest, but positively hostile to his employer, and desirous of doing him injury. Nor, considering that the parish was his real mainstay, is this to be wondered at.

(9.) Deterioration of morals.—This, of which the Report gives long and melancholy instances, must be taken for granted. No words of ours could do justice to it. To borrow the aid of alliteration, drink and dissipation, indolence and insolence, deception and dependence, had become the familiar characteristics of the men from whose ranks had come the soldiery who had astonished all Europe. In fact all the healthy laws, customs, and motives that bind society together were in this instance broken and cast aside. "There was never a better illustration of the truth that in morals as well as in political economy the laws of nature are wiser than those of man, and that the virtues of the mass of the people are as much at the mercy of the Legislature as their wealth—equally capable of injury from rash interference, and of recovery when that interference has ceased."

(10.) The destruction of family ties.—That part of the Act of Elizabeth which directed the maintenance of the impotent by relatives was very seldom enforced, with the consequence that "persons had no scruple in asking to be paid for the performance of those domestic duties which the most brutal savages are in general willing to render to their own kindred." Payments for looking after sick or aged parents were not at all uncommon. And it may be added that inasmuch as the law still allows impotent folk to be kept out of the house by the parish, traces of this feeling are still to be found. So certain is the operation of law in morals as in nature!

(11.) Improvident marriages.—Allusion has been already made to this evil, of which instances have been known, where the married couple left the church for the work-house. But it reappears also as part of the consequences of the law of bastardy, which is the last and most shocking abuse upon our melancholy list.

(12.) The earlier legislation in the time (eighteenth year) of Elizabeth upon the subject of bastardy had wisely contented itself with prescribing that in order to prevent illegitimate children from becoming chargeable to the parish (which is all that Poor Laws have to deal with), and so “defrauding of the relief of the aged and impotent true poor of the same parish,” the justices should compel the parents to support their child. An Act of James I., however, ordered the mother of an illegitimate child to be punished with imprisonment and hard labour. This failing,—as all attempts to treat vice as punishable crime must in the long run fail,—the Act of George III., previously mentioned, tried to punish the father by compelling the Justices to commit to prison, until he should have indemnified the parish from all charges, any man against whom a woman should swear an ex parte information that he was the father of her (as yet) unborn child. The actual operation of the law at the time we are speaking had come, under the stress of popular sentimentalism, to be as follows:—The Justices made an order that both parents should pay to the parish a weekly sum to maintain the child. The sum assessed on the woman was scarcely ever, if ever, exacted; the sum received from the man was paid over by the overseers to the woman, and if he were in default the parish made up the amount. To the woman, therefore, the child was little or no burden; to the man, upon whom she elected to swear it, being very often bribed by the real father, or even encouraged by the parish officers to choose a man able to pay, it often meant ruin so complete that he had to elect between fleeing the locality or marrying a woman who had in many cases either sworn falsely against him, or else for her own purposes tempted him to vice.

The consequences of this interference with nature’s law, that the shame and burden of illegitimacy shall devolve mainly upon the woman, are too shocking to be detailed in these pages: suffice it to say, that it was another example of the ruin which human folly, trying to be wise above what is written in nature's book, can bring upon the class or sex it seeks to benefit. Profligacy became a lucrative occupation, inasmuch as what the mother of two or three illegitimate children received from the fathers enabled her to live more comfortably than most decent families, more especially in the very common cases where the children were utterly neglected; nay, she was "considered a good object of marriage on account of these weekly payments," the proceeds of the sale of virtue becoming in this way a marriage portion! But enough of this: let the evidence of one witness out of many serve to illustrate the whole. "The daughters of some farmers, and even landowners, have bastard children, who keep their daughters and children with them, and regularly keep back their poor rate to meet the parish allowance for their daughters' bastards. We have no doubt the same grievance exists in many other parishes."

IV. INDOOR RELIEF.—The condition of the workhouses is not very fully gone into in the Report itself, though the appendix containing the evidence of the witnesses examined enables us to see clearly how entirely the opinion of the Commissioners was justified, "that indoor relief, as given within the walls of the poorhouse, is also subject to great mal-administration." A published account of one workhouse, by Mr. Chadwick, had excited great attention, and the Commissioners state that in their opinion, in respect of the absence of classification, discipline, and employment, and of the extravagance of the allowances, it was only a specimen of ordinary work-houses in similar towns. We shall, however, at this point leave the Report, and quote from the account of an eyewitness as contained in the Quarterly Review article (No. 106), to which previous reference has been made. The humour and dramatic power with which it is written, albeit such qualities appear mournfully out of place in such a scene, make it well worthy of perusal.

“To give our readers a full and correct notion of the poorhouses in East Kent would be almost as difficult as to sketch him a picture of the variegated surface of the globe.” . . . Some are lofty, some low, but all (i.e. those built under Gilbert’s Act) are massive and costly. . . . One might be called an elegant retreat, splendidly contrasted with the mean little ratepaying hovels at its feet, which, like a group of wheelbarrows round the Lord Mayor’s coach are lost in the splendour of the gilded spectacle. . . . Others again are composed of old farmhouses, more or less out of repair. Some are supported by props; many are really unsafe . . . and are so dilapidated, so bent by the prevailing wind, that it seems a problem whether the worn-out, aged inmate will survive his wretched hovel, or it him.”

“In some of the largest of these habitations an attempt has been made to classify and arrange the inmates, and, generally speaking, every apartment is exceedingly clean. In one large room are found sitting in silence a group of motionless, worn-out men, with age grown double, with nothing to do, with nothing to cheer them, with nothing in this world to hope for, gnarled into all sorts of attitudes, so that they look more like pieces of ship timber than men. In another room are seen huddled together a number of old exhausted women, clean, tidy, but speechless and deserted. Whenever we asked whether they were often visited we invariably received the same reply, 'Oh no! people seldom takes any notice of 'em after they once gets here.'

"Going through the sick wards, as we passed one poor man he said he knew he was dying, and, raising his head from his pillow, begged hard that 'little George' might be sent for; but the master, accustomed to such scenes, would have considered the request inadmissible, had not the Assistant Commissioner ventured rather strongly to enforce it.

"On descending the staircase the next scene was a room full of sturdy labourers out of work; these were generally sitting round a stove, with their faces scorched and half roasted; as we passed them they never rose from their seats, and had generally an overfed, a mutinous, and an insubordinate appearance. A room full of girls of from five to sixteen, and another of boys of the same ages, completed the arrangements," and it is added that separation was only nominally enforced. So much for the larger houses.

"In the smaller ones classification has been found impossible; all that is effected is to put the males of all ages into one room, and all the females into another. In these cases the old are teased by the children, who are growled at when they talk, and scolded when they play, until they become cowed into silence. The able-bodied men are the noisy orators of the room; the children listen to their oaths, and, what is often much worse, to the substance of their conversation; while a poor idiot or two, hideously twisted, stands grinning at the scene, or, in spite of remonstrances, incessantly chattering to himself. In the women's hall, which is generally separated only by a passage from the men's, females of all characters and of all shapes live with infants, children, and young girls of all ages." . . . "A large attic used as a dormitory for married couples," completes the description.

"In the small tottering hovels we found generally seven or eight old people at the point of death, an able-bodied labourer or two, with a boy or a young girl, who was generally said to be 'only a love child.' Sometimes we discovered but two or three inmates in these diminutive poor huts; there was, however, always a being termed the governor; and in one case we found only two paupers, one being his Excellency, and the other his guest.

" 'And so his man Friday kept his house neat and tidy,
For you know 'twas his duty to do so;
Like brother and brother, who live one with another,
So lived Friday and Robinson Crusoe.'"

If the question be naturally asked, why people consented to inhabit these places, the answer is, that they were bribed into them by the promise of abundance of food. "Everywhere the Kentish pauper has three, four, or five 'meat days' per week; his bread is many degrees better than that given to our soldiers; he has vegetables at discretion; and in the larger houses the boast is, 'We gives 'em as much victuals as ever they can eat.'"

"In Kent, stall-fed charity, in order to bait the work-house trap, arranged, printed, and published a bribe, which we consider as one of the most astonishing documents in the pig-sty history of our Poor Laws."

This document is the contract for providing workhouse fare, from which we gather that the contractors were to furnish, inter alia, "warm, wholesome, sweet, clean, comfortable beds; servants to cook and serve the victuals, and attend on the poor; good, sweet, wholesome fat meat, good sound small beer, best flour, good Gloucester cheese, good and clean butter." Pork and salt meat were forbidden. Bacon and fish were allowed as a variety. The fires were to be good, and kept up in certain rooms at all hours, so that the paupers might boil their tea-kettles. Lastly, the contractors were "to PROVIDE WIGS for such as wear them or require them."

This, we think, is enough, and more than justifies the moral with which the Assistant Commissioner concluded his address, to the labouring classes of the county of Kent: "the hanger on ought not to be raised higher than him on whom he hangs."

The above description will serve to show the nature of the abuses with which the Poor Law Commissioners had to deal, and will therefore explain the remedies which they suggested. As these were practically embodied in the Poor Law Amendment Act, which is the system now in force, we need only mention the principal reforms which they recommended. Some of these, it may be added, had already been tried with success.

(1.) All relief to able-bodied persons, except in well-regulated workhouses, to be declared illegal. This is the celebrated "workhouse test."

(2.) The appointment of a Central Board to control the administration, to frame and enforce regulations as to giving relief, and to make those regulations uniform.

(3.) The formation of Unions of parishes, according to the discretion of the Central Board, to provide and build a common workhouse for the district ; each parish, however, to pay for its own poor, and to pay for the establishment charges (i.e. the house and officers), according to the average cost of its own paupers. (This looks as though the Commissioners expected the entire cessation, in time, of out-relief.)

(4.) Certain regulations as to uniformity of accounts, appointment and removal of officers, furnishing of supplies by contract,—all intended to put down serious abuses.

(5.) Alterations in the law of apprenticing, to be made by the Central Board, as their future experience may determine.

(6.) The same as to vagrants, with the view of making their relief to be such as only the destitute will accept. They are hopeless as to the benefit of express enactments.

(7.) All settlements to be abolished, except by parentage, till children are sixteen ; by marriage in the case of women ; and by birth, i.e. the place where any person shall have been first known to have existed, in all other cases. (This recommendation was not altogether carried out in the Act, which retained settlement by residence for one year, provided the person paid the poor rates, and, in deference to common law, settlement by property if the owner lived within ten miles.)

(8.) All punishment of parents of illegitimate children to be abolished, as being worse than useless, and the whole matter to be taken out of the province of Poor Law by the enactment that the child shall follow until sixteen the settlement of the only known parent, i.e. the mother, who is also to be made irremovable, unless she asks for relief. If she does apply, the relief for the child is to be considered as relief to the mother, as in the case of widows. (The Act, however, while throwing upon the mother the burden of providing for her child till the age of sixteen, or upon her husband, if she marries, prescribed that if the child became chargeable, the overseers might apply to the Justices, who, if they were satisfied by sufficient corroborative evidence, might make an order upon the father to pay a certain weekly sum,¹ no part of which should be applicable to the support of the mother. With this, which only extends the general Poor Law principle of responsibility of relations to the case of illegitimacy, bastardy ceases to be a special part of Poor Law administration, and further mention of the subject may be spared.)

The Bill founded upon these recommendations was read a second time in the House of Commons on the 9th of May 1834, by a majority of 299 votes to 20. It was, however, modified during its progress by clauses meant to restrict the power of the Central Board, and its duration limited to five years. It was introduced into the House of Lords by Lord Brougham, and supported by the Duke of Wellington, and carried on the second reading against a minority of 13 votes.

In 1838 the Act was extended to Ireland, where, as there had been no Poor Law at all, the whole system had to be created from the beginning. The Irish Poor Law was substantially the same as the English, with this important modification, that out-relief was altogether prohibited, a fact which would seem to show, if proof were needed, that out-relief is not a necessary part of Poor Law administration. A somewhat melancholy commentary upon the system of out-relief is afforded by the fact that in 1859 there were five paupers in Scotland¹ (of all countries in the world !) for one in Ireland, and twelve in the Highlands to one in Ulster and Connaught. (Sir John M'Neill in the Fourteenth Annual Report, Scotland.)

The new Poor Law was introduced in Scotland in 1845, but no attempt can be made to deal with the subject of Scotch Poor Law in this volume.¹ It would, however, be impossible to pass over the name of Dr. Chalmers in any treatise concerning the Poor Law, which he opposed so strenuously, and for a while so successfully. The circumstances are briefly these :—

The old Scottish Poor Law was based upon a statute of 1579, and bore a close resemblance to the earlier legislation of Queen Elizabeth, by which the church-officers in each parish were to provide for the destitute by means of semi-voluntary assessments. In England, as we have seen, owing to divisions in the Church and to the supremacy of the State, the further step was taken of creating legal means of relief separate from ecclesiastical authorities ; but in Scotland, where these conditions did not prevail, the law remained as it was. The Kirk-Sessions, that is, the ministers and elders, had the ordinary management of the parochial poor, and the control over the weekly collections and other subscriptions. This was the state of things which Dr. Chalmers, having a strong aversion to Poor Law, and especially to the form which it had assumed in England before 1834, revived in his parish at Glasgow; the Church taking charge of the poor, upon a system of minute investigation and moral aid, much resembling the Elberfeld experiment, of which it may claim to be the forerunner. The system was as successful in the one town as in the other, but depended upon the influence of one man; and it is said that in the rest of Scotland the relief of the poor was very inadequate and partial. Accordingly, the Act of 1845 formed a central Board of Supervision, composed of the chief magistrates of certain large towns, together with members nominated by the Crown; and under their management most of the parishes have accepted the principle of compulsory assessment, and have elected Parochial Boards to take charge of poor relief. Poorhouses have been established upon the English model; and the diet, at any rate in respect of luxuries, made inferior to that of the self-sustaining labourer.

It is but right to add that that part of Dr. Chalmers' arguments against Poor Laws which was founded upon the attractiveness of great and elaborate systems upon the poor, so as to draw them to ask for out-relief, has been abundantly justified by experience. The pauperizing effects of the new Poor Law were found to be considerable, contrary to what happened in England, outdoor relief being the rule in proportion of twelve to one. (See a paper read before the British Association in 1871, by Mr. Peterkin, Superintendent of the Poor.)

CHAPTER V.

POOR LAW ADMINISTRATION.

WE are now to give the reader some idea of the actual working of the Poor Law at this present moment, noting as we proceed the principal alterations that have been made since the new Poor Law came into existence. The main outlines of the system are perhaps not very difficult of comprehension, but the details, especially the legal questions, are very elaborate and perplexing, and there are perhaps few subjects upon which legal opinion has been more often taken. The mass of literature in the shape of reports, discussions, speeches, and law books, is enormous ; and it is perhaps not the least serious charge that can be brought against the Poor Law that it has absorbed, it may be in artificial channels, so large a share of human industry, ingenuity, and ability. And if the outward appearance of the system be simple and its working smooth, it is only by reason of careful attention to an immense variety of unnoticed details, and also of deference to certain principles or arrangements which have established themselves after prolonged inquiry and discussion by some of the ablest men in England. And yet, as it will be our duty in the following pages to point out, nothing like finality can be said to have been arrived at, while the cost of pauperism and number of paupers remains what it is.

We shall break up this chapter into five parts, namely the Central Authority, the Local Authorities, Out-Relief, Indoor Relief, and the present state of the Law of Settlement, with which is connected the areas over which contributions are raised by local rating. It must, however, be borne in mind that the subjects of central and local government, together with the method of providing for the national expenditure, belong to other books in this series, and are only treated here so far as some acquaintance with them is necessary to the clearer understanding of Poor Law administration.

PART I.—THE CENTRAL AUTHORITY.

The existing Poor Law Central Authority, now called the Local Government Board, has grown by three successive changes out of the original Poor Law Commission formed in 1834. The first change, which might be almost called a crisis, took place at the end of the five years for which the Commission was originally established. The strong and general reaction which ensued upon the heroic reform legislation of the previous years culminated in so fierce an attack upon the Poor Law Amendment that it remained doubtful for some years whether this part of the reforming measures would not have to be, in part at least, sacrificed as a kind of expiatory victim for the rest. The Commissioners had in a few years almost transformed the face of the country, and no rational person could doubt the good they had accomplished. But they had been brought into conflict with the selfishness, timidity,¹ and obstructiveness of local authorities, not only with those whom they had superseded, but with those whom they had created, and who in certain places, e.g. Bolton, Nottingham, and Macclesfield,² had been elected expressly to defeat the new law. Then, again, they had to contend with the easily aroused popular dislike of centralized administration, reinforced by the still more easily roused popular sentiment against severity of treatment. Expressions such as these, "Bashaws of Somerset House," "unconstitutional," "tyrannical," "dictatorship," "star-chamber," "concentrated icicles," were heard at every electioneering meeting, and it became evident that the Commissioners would have to fight hard for their existence.

This they did in the Report of 1839, to which previous reference has been made, and which, dictated and inspired as it was by something like temper and the spirit of resistance to blind injustice, is one of the very ablest and most decisive State papers ever written. The description they give of the duties and operations of the Board may serve for the present day. They distinguish between the business they originate and that which arises out of the applications for advice by the local authorities. The first consists of the introduction and maintenance of the machinery of the Poor Law, such as the constitution of unions, election of guardians, defining the duties of officers, restrictions upon out-relief, survey and valuation of rateable property. The second consists in dealing with all the difficult, especially legal, questions which the novelty of the law was sure to raise. And they point out that centralization was inevitable in all branches of national administration, and was particularly needed in a department where so many gross evils, that had grown up for want of it, had been but just partially extirpated, and would be sure to break forth if once the strong hand of the Commission was removed. They further pointed out that a Central Board took the responsibility and bore the blame of proceedings which, however right and just, the local authorities could not be expected to carry out if left to face the force of public opinion by themselves; and also that they relieved Parliament of the burden and unpopularity of issuing detailed regulations in order to promulgate and carry into effect the laws which Parliament had enacted. The defence so far succeeded that the Commission was renewed annually for three successive years, and in 1842 was established for five years more.

At the close of this period in 1847 a change was made which was warranted by the circumstances of the times. The special reforming functions of the Commission, as a body standing aloof from Parliament and from politics, had now been discharged, and it was thought advisable that a ministerial department should be constituted responsible to Parliament, and able to defend itself where it was attacked. Accordingly several of the chief officers of State were named Commissioners for administering the Poor Law, together with a person or persons specially nominated by the Crown, the responsible minister being called the President of the Poor Law Board. Twenty years afterwards it began to be felt that Poor Law administration had come to be a comparatively simple matter, and that under any circumstances it hardly required a separate department for itself. Added to this there was the growing necessity of making some provision, in rural places especially, for a revival of local government, in connection with such matters as the public health and primary education. In 1871, therefore, the name of the department was altered into the Local Government Board, which was placed more entirely under one responsible head by the other Cabinet Ministers ceasing to be ex officio members of it, and in that capacity to countersign the documents which it issued. But whether as regards the central or the local authorities, it is only as far as concerns the administration of the Poor Law that they belong to the subject of this book.

Now, it is to the Central Board, by whatever name it has been known, that every iota of the organization we are about to describe is directly due. From first to last the Poor Law has been exactly what the Poor Law Board has made it, and there has been no relaxation of the absolute control which the Board has exercised over every detail of administration. It will be of interest, therefore, to point out the means by which this control has been exercised and maintained.

First, of course, there is the power to issue orders and rules in order to carry out the intentions of the Legislature, in respect of which the largest latitude was allowed by the Poor Law Amendment Act. No Union could be formed, nor workhouse built, nor mode of giving relief adopted, except by authority of the Commissioners. Setting aside the letters of instruction, which are rather of the nature of explanations and suggestions, the actual orders now in force—themselves in many cases only consolidations of numerous earlier regulations which they have superseded—occupy many hundred pages of printed matter, and extend over the whole field of administration down to the smallest details that can be imagined. A very effective instrument of control is to be found in the almost innumerable forms or schedules according to which not only are all returns to be made, but all the business of relief to be transacted. It is not possible, indeed, to move a single step without using them. Those relating to the smallest matters that have come under my notice are instructions how to make tea and rice puddings.

The most important orders are those of 1844, forbidding relief to the able-bodied, called the General Prohibitory Order; the Consolidated Order of 1847, laying down strict regulations for (amongst other things) the meetings of guardians, the management of workhouses, and the duties of officers; another in 1867, regulating the mode of keeping accounts; and another as to vagrancy in 1871. What, then, we naturally ask is the machinery by which obedience to these orders is peremptorily enforced?

First there are the Inspectors, who in 1847 took the place of Assistant Commissioners. These gentlemen have been called the eyes and ears of the Board, and the reports which they present to their department, some of which are published in the annual Blue Book, are often of a value far beyond the immediate occasion which calls them forth. They are not only interesting expositions of Poor Law policy and practice, but frequently throw much light upon curious phases of English social life and even of our national characteristics. And whatever else may be said of the Poor Law, it is at least true that it has to deal with human beings, and that too in such a way as to open up some of the most delicate and interesting questions that human nature, with all its follies, foibles, and eccentricities, can give rise to. We suspect that Poor Law administrators see as much as most people of the various aspects of life, especially of those that are either humorous or pathetic, or both together.

The specific duties of the inspector are to attend the meetings of Boards of Guardians, where he may take part in the proceedings without the power of voting; to inspect workhouses and every place where relief is administered; to investigate complaints, should any be made; to give advice in doubtful cases, and to bring the results of his experience and knowledge before the local administrators; to point out mistakes, and also the tendencies or results of a given policy; to hint at praise or censure in at any rate extreme cases. To enable all this to be done the country is divided into eleven districts for purposes of inspection, whereof the South-Eastern contains the largest number of Unions (98), and the Metropolis the smallest (30). It is clear from this that inspection is not intended to be of a very close and scrutinizing character, which indeed is not required by the nature of the office or the conditions of the case.

The second instrument of control possessed by the Central Board is the power of audit. The auditor examines the accounts of every authority and official, all of which are drawn up according to forms provided for the purpose, and it is his duty to refuse to pass any item where he suspects the least transgression of the law.

To make this clear by an instance : It is a condition of giving out-relief that children, if there be any of a school age, should attend school ; and we may observe that until quite lately educational requirements were stricter in the case of paupers than in that of the ordinary public. Before, then, the auditor will allow the relief that has been given to A, he will require to be shown from certificate of attendance that A's children have duly attended school, and if none be forthcoming he will surcharge the Guardians with the amount. There is then an appeal to the Central Board, where the decision of the auditor is generally upheld, but the surcharge remitted by the exercise of the "equitable jurisdiction" vested in the Board. In one year, out of 346 appeals, the power of remission was exercised in 264 cases and refused in 18. But in every case the surcharge operates as a very effective warning not to transgress again, and brings before the notice of the Central Board any irregularities that may be committed.¹

The number of audit districts is 33, not including the Metropolis, and they extend over one or more counties according to size. Within his own district the auditor has jurisdiction over the accounts of every authority empowered to raise money by local rating.

The third and not least effective weapon of control is the power which the Central Board has to discharge all officials employed by the local authorities, who in turn may not discharge their servants without the permission of the Board. The natural and intended effect of this is to make the officers virtually independent of the Local Boards so long as they do their duty, and to prevent pressure being put upon them to evade the directions of the department. The inspector is expected to interfere with any unfair treatment of a zealous officer, or unworthy partiality for an incompetent one; and no officer can be dismissed even for gross misconduct without, if he asks for it, an investigation conducted by an inspector according to the forms of a trial at law.

¹ It may be mentioned that it is also the auditor's duty to ascertain whether there is any undue waste of articles of food or drink, and that calculations have been made to enable him to know for how much waste he should allow. As a curiosity of legal interpretation we may add that it has been solemnly decided that he need not put his pen through the disallowed item, but merely write that word against it.—(See Glen's Poor Law Orders, p. 592.)

It is impossible not to see that the system just described constitutes a form of centralized administration as strong as could well be imagined. It is true that it may be defended, as the Report of 1839 did defend it, by a reference to other departments, such as the Army, the Treasury, and Primary Education. But the parallel does not hold altogether good. For in other cases the departments have to deal either with men who are their own servants, or more commonly with men, e.g. soldiers and teachers, whose business it is to discharge, under general regulations, certain professional duties of which they alone have a special and technical knowledge, and for which they receive payment from the State. But the local authorities or Guardians are unpaid, and are elected by their constituencies to exercise functions which are supposed to require deliberation, and involve responsibility. Hence it is clear that one of two things must happen: Either the local administration of the Poor Law will cease to have any interest or attraction for the men who are most competent to preside over it, or else the men elected to serve upon it will find out for themselves some opportunity of exercising a discretion of their own. What has been the actual course of events we are now to see.

PART II.—THE LOCAL AUTHORITIES.

One of the first duties of the Poor Law Commissioners under the Act of 1834 was to divide the country into districts, for the purposes of local administration. The obvious plan was adopted of making the larger towns, with their suburbs, into separate districts, and also dealing the same way with old country parishes, e.g. Wolstanton, wherever they extended over a large area and contained a sufficient population. In the case of rural places, parishes to the number of upon an average from twenty to thirty were grouped round the nearest market town, whence came the name Union, as applied to all the districts alike. This, which ought to have been a comparatively easy task, was much impeded, not only by local jealousies and disagreements, but by one of those causes which no country but England would tolerate, and which seem to savour of that incurable pedantry that some of our critics are wont to charge us with. Previous to the passing of the Act of 1834 we have noticed that voluntary Unions had been formed, called, from the author of the Act, Gilbert Incorporations, and consisting of just such parishes as, without any regard to convenience of locality, had chosen to unite together. And as, in spite of reiterated demands from the Central Board, Parliament refused to give it leave to dissolve these incorporations except with their own consent, it became frequently very difficult to arrange the Unions on a convenient system.¹ But these difficulties have long been overcome, and all England is now divided into 647 Unions, fresh ones being formed every now and then, as new centres of population are created; sometimes, on the other hand, two adjacent Unions are thrown together. Thirty of these are in the Metropolis, each of the large old parishes forming one. The eastern counties, more especially Lincolnshire, would seem to contain Unions with the largest number of parishes, rising in several cases to considerably over fifty. And Lincoln itself would head the list with 99 parishes, but for one of those survivals that are so picturesque in English history, by which the City of London, probably the smallest Union in actual extent, is credited with no less than 112 separate parishes.

Each of the parishes in the Union, or of the wards in large towns, elects one representative or more, according to population, to the Union Board, of which magistrates are ex officio members, though they rarely attend. But our business lies with the Guardian only regarded as an administrator of relief, and we must follow him at once into the Board-room at the workhouse, outside of which he is a mere private person, and has no separate or personal duties whatsoever. Thus the duty of collecting rates and of giving relief in cases of extreme urgency are fragments of his old power still retained by the overseer, being viewed in the latter case by the Guardians with a jealousy so marked that it is very rarely exercised. But within the walls of the Board room all the poor relief of the district passes at any rate through the Guardians' hands, and every effort is made by the Central Board to impress them with the sense of the reality of the powers they exercise, and of their responsibility for the proper performance of delicate and important duties. In order to gain some idea of the spirit which is supposed to animate the local authorities, and which may be thought of more importance than the details of administration, let us gather the following description of their duties from a report of 1846, together with that of 1839.¹

"When the Board of Guardians is once in operation its powers are very extensive; it dispenses all relief, appoints all paid officers, and administers all other Poor Law business in the Union, subject only to the general superintendence of the Commissioners and to the regulations issued by them." "The Board of Guardians forms an important and highly respectable representative body, being elected by the most numerous constituency known to the law." "We have ever sought to exercise our powers in such a manner as to avoid all unnecessary interference with Boards of Guardians, and have carefully abstained from doing anything which might extinguish the spirit of local independence." "For such local abuses as may occur the Boards of Guardians are in general primarily responsible. They have the chief part of the local power, and must therefore bear the chief part of the local responsibility." "The Commissioners (1846) state their conviction, derived from experience, of the generally discreet, trustworthy, attentive, and considerate manner in which the Boards of Guardians discharge their functions, and of their readiness to devote to the transaction of the business as much of their time as can be reasonably expected of the unpaid members of a body so constituted."

The above describes fairly enough the intentions of the Legislature and of the department that carries them into effect; but facts are stronger than intentions, and it remains to be seen how far, as a matter of fact,—especially now that the administration of relief has long got over the first difficulties and experiments,—the purely Poor Law duties of Guardians¹ deserve such epithets as "important" and "responsible." Let it be remembered that the task of superintending officers in the discharge of duties regulated down to the most minute particulars by superior authority, important as it is, does not involve the KIND of importance that is usually associated with elected bodies. Men are chosen to deliberate and discuss, and deliberation implies discretion, which, again, confers responsibility. Suppose, then, a Guardian elected after a hot contest by a large number of votes, going every week or fortnight a journey of perhaps several miles to the place of meeting at the expense of much valuable time, what subjects will he find when he gets there that will exercise his faculty of discretion? We will try and make the answer clear.

He will, in the first instance, be struck with the fact that the power possessed by every representative assembly of regulating its own proceedings within the limits of custom or common law is not possessed by the Guardians, but is regulated by sixteen articles which define the duties of the Board as to its way of transacting business. These include the times of meeting, appointment of presiding officers, time for adjournment in case of non-attendance, mode of voting, and order in which the business is to be taken. There is nothing in any of these that calls for further notice, except that the position of the clerk, being, as he is, irremovable by the Local Board, and answerable to the Board above for the correctness of an immense number of details, legal questions included, gives him a supremacy much greater than is usually held by similar officers. Then next he will discover that a good deal of the Poor Law business proper is administered by committees whose duties, again, are often of a formal character. Thus a man may be Guardian for many years without seeing the interior of the house, and a member of the Visiting Committee without doing more than pay an occasional formal visit. There is a Finance Committee, but so intricate and difficult are the accounts that the clerk is here practically supreme. (Of course this very general description must be taken as subject to many variations, and in large towns there is no doubt more to be done by action of the Guardians themselves.) Passing over such minor matters as examining and accepting tenders for goods (as regulated by eight articles in the Order of 1847), we now come to the only responsible part of a Guardian's duties. "They shall hear and consider any applications for relief which may be then made, and determine thereon."

It is understood that the Guardians must admit every applicant to a personal hearing, the application having been first made to the relieving officer, about whom hereafter.¹ But it is very doubtful whether the Board (or the Relief Committee, should one be appointed) would be justified in refusing indoor relief to any applicant who insisted upon admission. An instructional letter of 1842 lays it down that the power of discharging from the workhouse should only be exercised in cases where the pauper could be proceeded against criminally for neglecting to maintain his family; and the reason assigned "that persons not really destitute will not be willing to remain in the house" covers the case of those who are willing to enter it. Practically, therefore, this set of cases settle themselves. Then, supposing out-relief to be decided upon, the amount and duration of this, even in the most irregularly managed Boards, is generally roughly settled by some standard, and does not call for much serious discussion. There remains, therefore, one solitary question of the very deepest practical importance both to the working of the Poor Law and the welfare of the labouring classes generally, namely, whether the relief given shall be indoor or outdoor. Here the Guardians have, within certain limits, a very absolute discretion indeed, and it is the deciding between different opinions and policies in respect of the kind of relief to be offered that makes the duties of Guardians interesting to themselves and to their constituents. What that discretion is, and how they have used it, we will now consider under the head of out-relief: it is of the very essence of our subject.

PART III.—OUT-RELIEF.

The reader will remember that (to quote once more the Report of 1839) “the fundamental principle with respect to legal relief is that the condition of the pauper ought to be, on the whole, less eligible than that of the independent labourer;” and he will agree with the same report in the assertion “that all distribution of relief in money or in goods, to be spent or consumed by the pauper in his own house, is inconsistent with the principle in question.” Accordingly the first object of the Poor Law Commissioners was to put a stop to out-relief. Beginning in their first year with two districts, namely, Cookham Union and Sandridge Parish (First Report, page 28), they proceeded gradually in the face of much opposition,¹ till in the year 1844 a final order (reproducing one of 1839), called the Outdoor Prohibitory Relief Order, was issued, in which it was laid down that “every able-bodied person . . . requiring relief . . . shall be relieved only in the workhouse of the Union,” etc. In the face of which order we are confronted with the fact that in the beginning of this year (1881) the number of adult able-bodied outdoor paupers was returned for the 1st of January at 84,812, while indoor paupers were only 26,357, i.e. of the same class. And again, of the 268,923 outdoor paupers returned as adult not able-bodied, by far the larger number were persons whom only the approach of age (after sixty paupers are classed as not able-bodied) had rendered destitute after a life of ability to do work. What is the explanation of this apparent anomaly?

It is this. The Report of 1839 states that the Commissioners “permit out-relief to the able-bodied in all those cases of distress which are of most frequent occurrence, such as sickness, accident, bodily or mental infirmity in themselves and in their families.” This exception is carried forward into the General Prohibitory Order, and is increased by the addition of such cases as burial, widowhood for six months after the death of the husband, and for so long as there is any child dependent on the widow. Now from this two facts are clear. First, inasmuch as persons above sixty are not to be considered necessarily able-bodied, and are therefore outside the terms of the order, all aged persons who have made no provision for themselves during middle life may receive out-relief if the Guardians resolve to grant it. And secondly, all persons under sixty, if disabled by any cause either in their own persons or that of any of their families, are also eligible to the same kind of relief. Now, it has been stated (see page 15) that the two chief evils to which poor relief gives rise are idleness on the part of those who can work and will not, and improvidence on the part of those who can make provision for possible sickness or inevitable old age, but prefer to trust to the bounty of the State. The first class was dealt with finally and summarily in the Prohibitory Order, which forbids relief to any man capable of earning wages. But the second was by the express exceptions contained in that order left to the discretion of the local authorities, who have not been slow to avail themselves of the opportunity. How far the central authorities realized that this departure from their own admitted principles would lead once more to the establishment of a gigantic system of pauperism, in which the unthrifty and careless were maintained at the cost or to the prejudice of their more provident neighbours, does not very clearly appear. Certain it is that it has been turned by local administration to this end, and that, too, in spite of warnings almost amounting to threats, and expostulations almost descending to entreaties, from the Poor Law authorities themselves.

In saying this there is no intention to impute blame in any quarter, which would be in every way unseemly. But our object is to give such an account of the working of the Poor Law as shall convey to the reader some notion of the spirit in which it is administered, and also explain the tendencies that have led to the results actually before us. We shall therefore trace the operation of the law of out-relief somewhat more in detail.

The functionary through whom the Guardians perform this part of their work is that well-known person, the relieving officer, whose duties are prescribed in fifteen sections of Article 215 of the General Consolidated Order of 1847 (Glen, p. 215). The one that concerns us at present is No. 2, which states that he shall receive "all applications for relief made to him within his district, and forthwith examine into the circumstances of every case by visiting the house of the applicant, and by making all necessary inquiries, etc. etc., and report the result of such inquiries in the prescribed form at the next meeting." The "prescribed form" is called the Application and Report Book, and contains headings for all information that may be useful to the Guardians, including one that is much neglected, showing "names of relations liable by law to relieve the applicant" (see Report by Mr. Sendall, 1874, and Mr. Wodehouse, 1872). This book is laid before the chairman for him to record the decision of the Guardians at the "Board Day," whither the applicant is also summoned to attend, and be further questioned as to his destitution. But from the beginning to the end of this procedure one remark holds good: that unlimited discretion leads to unlimited variation in the methods by which it is carried out. Thus, the number of relieving officers in proportion to population and area varies indefinitely. One officer had 400 cases under his charge, the usual number being 200 to 250. Again, the practice of requiring the personal attendance of the applicant at the Board varies considerably, a man being always anxious to put it off upon his wife, and a woman upon some fair-spoken neighbour, while in some cases quite young girls are sent to plead the cause of their destitute relatives. The attendance of the Guardians themselves is of course fluctuating, and the fate of the applicants,—that is to say, whether they shall submit to a species of imprisonment or enjoy a little pension at their own homes,—not unfrequently depends upon whether this or that Guardian (the chairman especially) chances to be present or absent. In some Unions where there is a Relief Committee, one man (though it is believed that three are necessary to make a quorum in order to grant relief legally) sometimes adjudicates upon all the cases, and he, again, may be a strenuous supporter of the workhouse test one day, and an equally strong advocate for out-relief the next. Then, again, the time allowed for the disposal of each case at all times too short, is by no means the same, varying, according to the experience of one inspector (see Mr. Longley's Report on Out-Relief in the Metropolis, 1873), from eleven cases in four minutes to three minutes for each case. And there is an absolutely concurrent testimony that there neither is nor can be anything like adequate information as to the circumstances of the case upon which the Guardians can base their decision. But the subject of investigation deserves a special word of notice.

The plain fact is that the workhouse test has killed the spirit of investigation, as, by the confession of its supporters, it was meant to do. The following is quoted from the Report of 1839 :—"The only sure mode of ascertaining whether the total receipts of the labourer" (for this in the case before us we should read "total sources of income") "are really sufficient is to offer in lieu of them an adequate but less eligible maintenance, which will not be accepted unless necessity requires it. This can be effected by the offer of the workhouse, and by that only." Having this to fall back on in all doubtful cases, both relieving officers and Guardians are under strong inducement to dispense with long, costly, and disagreeable enquiries. The former pays his one preliminary visit (sometimes in large towns carefully prepared for by removal of furniture), and gathers just as much as local gossip can tell him. The latter have no means of knowing the facts of the case except what they can wring in a hurried cross-examination from some unfortunate applicant,—in nothing more unfortunate than this, that he is driven to gain his ends by craft and concealment,—more especially as to whether his friends can keep him, or as to what he receives from charity. But at this point ensues a curious phenomenon. Though Guardians are practically powerless in many cases to ascertain the reality of that destitution which is the only legal title to relief, yet they do know something about the character of the applicant, which, if the plain truth must be told, has nothing to do with it.¹ Thus if two men under precisely the same circumstances apply for relief, one of whom has borne a good character and succumbed to misfortune, the other has been just the reverse, it is still not permissible, upon any sound principle of Poor Law, to make a difference between them. And if we attend to the matter for a moment we shall see that the attempt to pass a moral judgment upon the two, involving the most serious material consequences, would necessitate, to be fair, a preliminary enquiry into their education, home influences, conduct of children, natural temperament, and the opportunities each had enjoyed of getting on in life. No doubt the temptation to exercise a moral discrimination is irresistible, and the Guardians try, with probably some success, to achieve a rough and ready justice, of which it may be said that it is morally excellent, but it is not Poor Law.

These, then, are the practical difficulties under which

the Guardians meet to exercise their discretion as to whether indoor or out-relief shall be given. But, and this is commonly the decisive argument, it is cheaper to allow a weekly pittance outside the house than to give maintenance within it—cheaper, that is, in any given case, though not in the long run, for all experience shows that the persistent refusal of out-relief does not increase the inmates of the house. But after all there is something stronger than even this. The Guardians know that every applicant who stands before them has been encouraged by the law to expect some allowance of out-relief whenever age or sickness has rendered him destitute. Is it reasonable to expect that they will, as a rule, take upon themselves the disagreeable responsibility of refusing the relief which the law allows them to give? If the Central Board or the Legislature, who are removed from actual contact with the pleadings of destitution, perhaps in the case of old workmen or even friends, shrink from prohibiting out-relief in such cases, how can the Guardians, with natural benevolence to prompt them and a character for kindness to keep up, abstain from following the easy course that saves them further trouble, and satisfies the conscience (until aroused by argument) and the pocket (until convinced by statistics and results) as well. The result is that the discretion enjoyed by Guardians tends steadily, though with very wide variations, in one direction, and that out-relief becomes the rule, indoor relief the exception. The proportion, excluding vagrants and lunatics, may be stated now at about one indoor pauper to 3.2 outdoor; ten years ago the proportion was one indoor to nearly six outdoor. There has therefore been some improvement in deference to the pressure of the Central Board and the more enlightened opinion of some Poor Law reformers. But enough remains to show that while the new Poor Law has dealt satisfactorily with the case of those who preferred to seek relief rather than work for wages (at worst a case so abnormal and unnatural that there could be no real difficulty in grappling with it), it has failed to meet the case of those who prefer relying upon relief to making provision against destitution out of their own resources. One half the work has been done, the other half,—including also the natural call upon relations, friends, and charity to “maintain their own poor”—is yet to be begun.

We have, however, hitherto only traced the system of out-relief up to the moment when it is first given to the applicant by the Guardians: we have now to carry our description to the mode in which it is distributed and continued.

That part of relief (by far the most important) which consists in grants of a certain weekly allowance to the sick and infirm is distributed by the relieving officer, who attends periodically at stated times and places (in country places once every week), in accordance with the regulation that orders him “duly and punctually to supply the weekly allowances of all paupers belonging to his district.” This may be given in money or in kind, and it is thought that the principle of poor relief is best carried out by the latter system. But in practice the giving of money is found so much more convenient, and the argument, that if people are to have relief at all they had better be left to make the best of it for themselves, seems so reasonable that relief in kind has become the exception. The book in which the paupers of each parish are entered is a very elaborate affair, containing no less than twenty-five different classes to which the recipient may belong. It is examined by the clerk and auditor, and forms the basis upon which the statistics of pauperism are framed. It is also the duty of the relieving officer to keep a strict supervision over the recipients of relief, and report to the Guardians such change in their circumstances as may have occurred, especially when the time expires for which their relief was granted, or for that periodical revision of the list of paupers which is carefully carried out by every properly-conducted Board.

Besides this there are, however, two other modes of giving out-relief. First it may be given to the able-bodied in some Unions in return for labour, in which case half of it must be in kind, and the work done under the superintendence of a special officer appointed for that purpose: the labour is mostly in the stoneyard. About 120 Unions, including the Metropolis and the larger towns, are allowed to employ this labour test instead of the house test, and are therefore not under the Outdoor Relief Prohibitory Order, but under the Outdoor Relief Regulation Order of December 1852. The reason of this policy is contained in a letter of 1852, in which the Board draws attention to "the circumstances of most of the Unions and parishes in London, and in some other populous places," in consequence of which they "leave the Guardians at liberty to offer relief in the workhouse only," but "do not prohibit out-relief to any class of paupers." The outdoor labour test would seem, then, to be reserved for special cases, as a "safety valve" at a time of great and sudden depression of trade. But it does not seem to be very extensively used, and is growing more and more unpopular with the relieving authorities.

The other form of out-relief is the medical. The whole of England is divided into districts which may not exceed 15,000 acres in extent, or 15,000 persons in population, and are in practice much smaller. Over each of these the Guardians appoint a medical officer residing in the district, who must, according to the regulations, "attend duly and punctually upon all poor persons requiring medical attendance, and supply the requisite medicines whenever he may be lawfully required by an order of the Guardians, or of a relieving officer, or of an overseer." He is bound to attend under such an order even when he may know that the person is not indigent, but he can report the circumstances at the next meeting. He cannot order articles of food for a sick pauper, but he can recommend them; and practically Guardians naturally shrink from the responsibility of refusing what he suggests. Persons already paupers are not relieved by special order, but receive a ticket, upon the exhibition of which the medical officer is bound to attend to them. He must give the Guardians such information as they may require, and must make a return of days on which visits were paid or attendance given, together with an account of the patients' condition. Medical relief given to parents alone does not make the children paupers.

Such are the arrangements whereby out-relief is granted and distributed: How, is the next natural enquiry, does the system work in actual operation? To answer this question we must refer to an enormous mass of literature, known as the reports of the inspectors who have from time to time been appointed to examine the

A careful examination of these reports (or some of them) will show that there is an absolute concurrence as to two main features in the working of outdoor relief. In the first place, considering that the reformed Poor Law was expressly intended to introduce uniformity and system, it has to be confessed that in this respect the failure is very great indeed. The exercise of local discretion has led to an almost infinite variableness of administration. No two Unions have the same principles or rules for dealing with the same class of cases ; no two officers take the same views as to the nature of their duties or the best way of performing them ; and, what is worse, no two destitute persons under similar circumstances can be at all sure of being dealt with in the same way. A kind of moral uncertainty is thus cast over the minds of the "poor," which, with its accompanying results of jealousy, disappointment, sense of injustice, and gambling away life upon the chance of out-relief, probably inflicts as much injury upon their mental, as the old system did upon their material, comfort.—(See Mr. Longley's Report, p. 30.)

In the next place, the reports are perfectly unanimous in their testimony as to the prevailing ignorance concerning the "cases" upon which the Guardians have to adjudicate. "The main reliance of Guardians must be placed in the regular and unintermitting routine of enquiry pursued by paid and responsible officers." "I cannot but think that a much nearer approach to it than is now made is possible." —(Mr. Wodehouse, p. 37.) "I detected considerable irregularity in the strict performance by the relieving officers of these all-important duties."—(Mr. Henley, Annual Report of Poor Law Board for 1871, p. 96.) But perhaps the following story, told by Mr. Sendall (p. 7), will serve to show to what extent out-relief may be abused from lack of information: it is but one out of hundreds upon hundreds that are mentioned in the reports, and which are practically known to exist throughout the country:—

"One of the officers of the — Union, engaged shortly after his appointment in looking up his cases, came upon a pauper of long standing at work in a well-stocked garden.

" 'You have got a nice bit of garden here?'

" 'Yes; it is pretty good.'

" 'And are those your pigs in the sty there?'

" 'Yes; they be mine.'

" 'And there is a horse and cart—is that yours too?'

" 'Oh, yes; that is what I goes to market with. And who be you, sir?'

" 'Well, I am the new relieving officer; and I think you had better come up and see the Guardians at next Board day.'"¹

After this we need not be surprised to hear the stories of paupers dying rich.

We shall next attempt to condense the defects noted

by the inspectors as proceeding from the want of uniformity and of information. We take the following twelve points more for the sake of the round number than for any hope of exhausting the list :—

(1.) The attendance of Guardians being fluctuating, and the composition of the Board on any one day uncertain, makes them what one inspector terms “pliable,” especially in the way of yielding to the applicant’s persistent refusal to enter the house. There is also a marked tendency to compromise cases by small temporary doles, and at times to evade the law in doing so.¹

(2.) The revision of the lists of paupers by the Guardians is very irregular. In some it is done punctually every quarter ; in others at chance times ; in some once a year, or even once in three years. The consequence is that in cases where destitution has ceased pauperism remains. As the visits of the relieving officers are mainly determined by the practice of the Guardians in respect of revising, it follows that the visits are at most uncertain intervals.

(3.) There is great laxity as to requiring the personal attendance of applicants. It is in many cases dispensed with ; and the Guardians rely on the information of the relieving officer, and the opinion of the Guardian of the parish, if present. The temptation to take the chance of obtaining relief, and so to apply for it, is thereby increased.

(4.) The system of the “pay table” is severely

criticised. The relieving officer meets the paupers at some fixed place—sometimes even a public-house, sometimes a cottage for which rent is paid—and there distributes the relief as though he were paying wages. Children or neighbours are sent (and paid) by the pauper to receive it. The districts are so large that this plan cannot be avoided, and some Unions are obliged to pay for conveyances.¹

(5.) There is a general complaint that the books and returns are not always accurately kept. This is of special importance in respect of classification of paupers.

(6.) The practice as to relief of deserted wives with children varies very much. No competent authority doubts that refusal of out-relief in these cases is the only course consistent with the due administration of the Poor Law. But in many cases it is given, except where the Guardians suspect “collusion.” The room thus given for fraud is obvious, and complaints of fraud are common.

(7.) The case of widows with more than one child dependent upon them (they are supposed to be able to maintain one child), as it is one of the most perplexing, so is it sure to lead to difference of treatment, and thence to abuses. “General sympathy for widows has suggested a lax administration of relief” is a heading to one report.—(Mr. Longley, p. 49.) A belief is still prevalent that “to put on the cap” entitles to parish pay.—(Ibid. p. 50.) There is always great difficulty in discovering their earnings, and all relief must be in their case relief in aid of wages, with the direct result that the wages of widows fall below that of independent women. In some cases where the relief has been discontinued, owing to the birth of an illegitimate child, the woman has never been obliged to accept the house, but has maintained herself without difficulty. The subject is far too long and difficult for discussion here; but the reader sufficiently interested in the matter is referred to Mr. Longley's Report on Poor Law Administration in London (1873), where it is fully gone into.

(8.) A very painful result of the present system is pointed out in the fact that paupers marry paupers, or have large families after becoming paupers, and live in the extreme of want in consequence. "Households such as these are the forcing-beds of pauperism."—(Mr. Sendall, p. 10.)

(9.) Relief is still given in aid of wages where aged or infirm people can earn a little, or are expected to do so. This is unavoidable, and perhaps not very injurious, though a contravention of all sound principles.

(10.) There is a melancholy concurrence of opinion that relations are not called upon to help as they ought to be, and that innumerable cases of pauperism exist where there are relations perfectly able to help, and who would do so (as in some cases they have done) sooner than allow their friends to go into the house. To take one instance out of many, a pauper in receipt of 2s. 6d. weekly was found acting as servant in her sister's household, whose position was that of a superior artizan. Prosecutions are rare; but in many cases it is said that the threat is sufficient. But this can only apply in cases where the relation is known.

(11.) Undue facilities are said to exist for receiving medical relief, and an injurious notion has got abroad that this kind of relief has not the same pauperizing effects. Very frequently the receipt of medical relief is the beginning of pauperism, and a fear is even expressed lest the system degenerate into one of medical State charity. Connected with this are very grave complaints as to "medical extras," by means of which the doctor orders food instead of medicine. The Guardians are then able to give relief in aid of wages, and persons are encouraged to apply for medical relief in the hope that food and stimulants will follow. It happens, too, that meat ordered for the sick is used for food for the family; thus "beef ordered for beef-tea to a dying husband was found two hours later in the frying-pan."

(12.) The outdoor labour test is subject to great abuses. The stoneyard has an attraction for the indolent, and some cases are known in which men work at their own employment in the summer, and "for the Guardians," i.e. at the stoneyard, in the winter.

We trust the reader will pardon these details of defective administration which have been laid before him in order that he may know the actual working of the system which is supported by his money, and is maintainable only so long as public opinion chooses to abide by it. Many improvements have been suggested, with the bare mention of which we must be content. Some place reliance upon improved methods of administration by local authorities. Others would introduce a new classification of recipients of out-relief, by which persons of bad character (we venture to think an impossible suggestion), or those whose wages have previously enabled them to make provision for their wants, should be debarred from out-relief. Others, again, would make the area of out-maintenance and administration much smaller than that for indoor, so as to put pressure upon localities to prefer the latter, and also to subject the applicant or the pauper to much closer supervision and control. Others, among whom the author may perhaps be permitted to include himself, are absolutely convinced that the whole system of out-relief could be without difficulty abolished in a very few years, just as the old system was abolished some forty years ago by the action of the Central Board in issuing prohibitory orders. The conditions of the two cases seem fairly parallel.

PART IV.—INDOOR RELIEF.

The indoor relief, as established by English Poor Law, is, we may say at once, though not without blots, as we shall see, thoroughly worthy of the good sense and practical humanity of the English people. With the exception of lunatic asylums, infirmaries, and district schools in large (mostly metropolitan) Unions, this kind of relief is given in houses miscalled workhouses, one of which has been built in each Union since the Act of 1834. The name Workhouse was given them from some idea that they would be used for the purpose of setting able-bodied paupers to work, according to the statute of Queen Elizabeth and the requirements of the house test. But that test has proved so efficacious that the number of inmates really able-bodied is comparatively few, and the house has become the permanent home of persons disabled by some misfortune or other from taking care of themselves. As the number of persons for whom the State thus provides a home was at the beginning of this year 189,438 (not including vagrants), and as the number is subject to constant loss and as constant renewal, so that the total passing through the house on the way to the grave is very considerable, it becomes every citizen to have some idea of the kind of institution which the law provides at his cost for the care of these who are "the poor in very deed."

We will first of all take a glance at the officers. These are the doctor, master and matron, chaplain, schoolmaster, nurse, porter, and such assistants as the size of the house renders necessary: the duties of all these are defined in the most careful manner in the order of 1847.—(Glen, pp. 182-215.)

With respect to the doctor, chaplain, and schoolmaster (or more generally mistress), no more can be said than that the professional duties which they are accustomed or expected to perform in the exercise of their respective callings elsewhere are rigorously exacted on behalf of the inmates of the house, and that any known neglect would be visited by immediate censure, to be followed by dismissal, if persisted in. Thus, to take one instance, it is not thought right to administer Holy Communion except there is a chapel set apart for divine service, but the paupers should be allowed to go to the parish church for that purpose. Permission to attend church or chapel is optional with the Guardians, and there are special provisions for allowing the attendance of ministers of religion in case any inmate desires to be visited by a minister of his own denomination. The conditions upon which this right should be exercised were definitely settled in the case of the Roman Catholic inmates of Chelsea Workhouse in 1861, under the authority of the Court of Queen's Bench (Glen, p. 125). It need hardly be added that the inmates are under the protection of the "conscience clause," and that in particular the children of paupers enjoyed that protection long before it was vouchsafed to the children of the independent labourer.

It is, however, the master and matron upon whom it depends whether the intentions of the Legislature are carried out towards the unfortunate persons who have accepted maintenance from the State, and neither regulations nor such supervision as the Guardians can give will avail much against the consequences of their faults and shortcomings. No one, not even we should think the captain of a man of war, has more absolute control within his own domain, or can make his power more sharply felt. Everything that careful regulations can accomplish is done in order to make them discharge the duties of their office properly. They are instructed to see that every pauper upon admission (which must be by order of the Guardians, or provisionally by the relieving officer, or in cases of emergency by the master himself) is searched, cleansed,¹ clothed, and put in the proper ward. They must enforce order, industry, punctuality, and cleanliness. They must read prayers morning and evening. They must enforce employment upon every inmate according to his or her capacity for work, and allow no one who can work to be idle at any time. They must visit the wards (the master or matron, according to the sex of the occupants) every morning at eleven to see that they are duly cleansed, and every night in summer at ten and in winter at nine to see that the paupers are in bed. They are to take care that no pauper, upon the approach of death, is left unattended night or day, and to give notice of his death to the nearest relations who may be known to exist. Lastly, they are to say or cause to be said grace before and after meals.

The duties of the porter require a special word of mention, because that officer is the outward symbol, so to speak, of that Poor Law constraint which may be defined as voluntary imprisonment. He is to keep the gate and allow no one to go in or out without leave of the master, except of course the Poor Law officers. He is further to register the names and business of every person visiting the house, and to see that nothing unlawful is brought into it. The gates are locked at nine and opened in the morning at six.

We turn next to the government of the workhouse, as it applies to the inmates themselves, the spirit and intention of which is thus described in the Report of 1839. "The rules which we have issued are of two classes. 1. Those which are necessary to the maintenance of good order in any building in which considerable numbers of persons of both sexes and of different ages reside. 2. Those which are necessary in order that these establishments may not be almshouses but workhouses in the proper meaning of the term, and may produce the results which the Legislature intended." This second clause points back to an old controversy, which was at that time still unsettled. A strong disposition was evinced to modify the arrangements of the houses, so as to make them in the case of the aged and infirm into almshouses, against which it was urged with irresistible force that the house would then no longer operate as an inducement to persons to provide support for themselves or their relatives in declining years. Facts, however, once more are stronger than intentions, and partly owing to the efficacy of the test, partly owing to the giving of out-relief to the infirm and aged, the workhouse is, as we have said, practically an infirmary or almshouse for the worst cases of impotence and suffering. But its original conception still adheres to it, namely, to "subject the pauper inmate to such a system of labour, discipline, and restraint, as shall be sufficient to outweigh in his estimation the bodily comforts which he enjoys." This has been accomplished very effectually, more so, it is said, in the case of the women than the men; but unfortunately as a means of prevention it comes too late, for by far the larger number of those who enter the workhouse (unless it be avowedly only for a time) have no choice but to remain there. And the condition does not avail to force persons to provide for themselves in old age, because they have always the chance of out-relief to rely on.

The methods by which this condition of steering between a jail and an almshouse, between punishment and charity, is carried out, may be described under the heads of classification, diet, discipline, and punishment, i.e. for the unruly. In respect of the first, the house (if properly arranged) is divided into seven parts or wards, for as many classes of inmates, viz. aged and infirm men, able-bodied men, boys above seven and under fifteen, the same three classes of women, and children under seven. Between these there is or ought to be no communication, and the Guardians are further empowered to subdivide them according to their moral character or previous habits. It is clear, however, that this can only apply to large houses. There is a great number of extra regulations allowing inmates to be employed for such purposes as nursing in other wards than their own; and as the result of a long controversy, aged and infirm couples are not to be separated, age receiving the rather liberal interpretation of above sixty.¹ And as children still at the age of nurture, i.e. under seven, have a right to be with their mother, they may be placed in the female wards, and their mothers allowed access to them at all reasonable times. Above that age interviews between parents and children must be granted once a day.

As to food the simplest way will be to copy a dietary, published by the Central Board, the quantities, however, being only specimens and not absolutely binding: they are given for men, the women being allowed in some cases somewhat less.

¹ Separate apartments are sometimes provided for aged couples, and, it is said, very seldom claimed.

The aged and infirm have, however, special allowances of tea and bread and butter, instead of porridge, for breakfast and supper, with "sugar not exceeding half an ounce to each pint of tea ;" and we may add, as curiously characteristic of the cold-blooded equity that presides over workhouse management, that an inmate can call upon the master to weigh the food provided for him in his own presence and in that of two witnesses: he can also complain to the Guardians of anything unsatisfactory in the food, with the certainty of being attentively listened to. The sick dietary is under the control of the medical officer. Lastly, as most people know, Christmas Day (together with public festivals) is the one day that is exempt from dietary regulations, and is made an occasion of regaling the inmates with a substantial repast.

In respect of discipline, the pauper inmate is never allowed to forget that he is under orders. The clothing must be such as the Guardians approve; but it is expressly forbidden to wear a distinguishing dress as a mark of disgrace. The inmates must perform work suitable to their capacity and without remuneration, but privileges in the way of food are granted to persons employed in the work of the house, e.g. nursing. They rise in the morning, are set to work, leave off work, meet for meals in the common dining-room, and go to bed at set hours, "notified by the ringing of a bell," and the names are called over half an hour after rising. Games of chance and smoking are prohibited, but the Guardians are permitted and even encouraged to supply books and newspapers. And, finally, there is a long code of regulations respecting the punishment of the two classes into which evildoers are divided, the disorderly and the refractory. The punishment in the first case consists of cutting off the food according to the discretion of the master, and of solitary confinement by order of the Guardians for not more than twenty-four hours in the second. Wise men will note with satisfaction that the use of the rod is not forbidden in the case of naughty boys, though its use is guarded by several regulations as to the person employing it, and the time that must elapse (two hours) after the commission of the offence. The privilege of a flogging enjoyed by children of the upper classes is denied to paupers above the age of fourteen.

The power of terminating this voluntary imprisonment requires to be noticed. Any pauper can leave upon giving reasonable notice, and his family must be sent with him, unless there are special reasons to the contrary, such as the child being at a district school or in the infirmary. Persons under punishment or too ill to travel may of course be detained. Orphan children under sixteen may be detained if the Guardians see good ground for it, above sixteen they are for Poor Law purposes considered to be of age. There is nothing to prevent the mothers of illegitimate children from discharging themselves and returning every few days. It is doubtful whether the Guardians have power to detain a wife whose husband is in the house, but they can certainly do so if the husband exercises his marital authority to forbid her departure. It results, therefore, that the pauper is perhaps the only member of the community to whom the law can afford efficient help in compelling the obedience of wives.

It is not, however, by the mere recapitulation of rules and arrangements that we can adequately describe the manner in which English Poor Law has endeavoured to carry out the principle of affording to the indigent all the necessaries of life, together with equitable and reasonable treatment, while at the same time stamping its consideration for their wants with something from which the natural man, still more the natural woman, shrinks with aversion. If the paradox may be pardoned, the spirit of a workhouse may be described as one of cheerless comfort. Much of this is quite inevitable upon any reasonable principles of Poor Law administration ; much more of it belongs to the workhouse, not because it is an institution of Poor Law, but because it is an asylum for a number of persons afflicted with some of the worst evils to which flesh and spirit are heirs. But much is also due to the fact, which ought never to be lost sight of, that the workhouse has come to be something in one respect very different from what its founders expected it would be. To this point we are now to invite the reader's careful attention, for it may lead us to discern the weak parts of the present system and also the mode of improving it. Practically, every English voter is responsible for the treatment of some 100,000 of his fellow-countrymen, who in the extremity of their distress have thrown themselves upon the care of the nation; and we can hardly overestimate the effects which their treatment may have upon the classes from which they are mainly drawn, upon the morality of the whole country, and upon the conscience and spirit of the governing classes. Upon such a subject full information is most desirable.

The immense scale upon which the workhouses were planned and built, and the fact that each union was to have its own separate house, shows—first, that they were expected to contain a large number of persons driven into them by the want of employment; secondly, that by their means each union was intended to discharge all the duties it owed to all classes of its own paupers. But as a matter of fact (the large towns excepted) they do not contain in many cases half, in some not a quarter of the inmates for which they were built, so that the waste in keeping up large unfilled establishments, each with an expensive staff of officers, is very great indeed; thus the salaries and rations of officers (including, however, that proportion which is spent in the administration of out-relief) is considerably over a million, while the total maintenance of indoor paupers is only about a million and three-quarters.

Again, the absence of able-bodied workers in what is called a workhouse gives a totally different character to the establishment. The exceptions are not the industrious, not even the merely improvident poor, but those of downright bad character, whom temporary pressure, perhaps of disease, has driven within its walls; the typical case is that of mothers of illegitimate children. So that a workhouse does not contain persons who can work, but does contain those very classes whom one would least of all select to associate with each other: both sexes, extreme ages, different degrees of imbecility and disease, those who are much to be pitied, and those who are much to be blamed. All these are under the same roof, and under the government of the same officials, who may be as fit to deal with one class of inmates as they are unfit to deal with another. Hence there comes from this aggregation of classes a something that may be described as the workhouse essence: it is neither school, infirmary, penitentiary, prison, place of shelter, or place of work, but something that comes of all these put together. Nor is it possible by any classification to prevent contact and, it may be, moral contagion; in the smaller houses classification is at all times difficult, and in no case does it hold good at meals, church, and other occasions. And it may well be that the regular and peaceable (afflicted) inmates endure much preventible suffering from the operation of this cause.¹

¹ The most difficult case is of course that of women coming into the house to be confined, and women of bad character, who can almost come and go as they please. It may illustrate at once the difficulties of Poor Law administration and the spirit in which they are met, if we quote in connection with this subject a circular letter of the Poor Law Board (Glen, p. 103). "So long as the inmates of the workhouse conform themselves to the prescribed rules, the law does not recognize any distinction (e.g. as to dress or diet or time of rising) amongst them founded upon their antecedent conduct; and the Board cannot therefore sanction a particular treatment in respect of a peculiar class of inmates, which is intended to operate

But the really great sufferers by present arrangements are the children, and they are also precisely the class of paupers, the obligation to take care of whom, as being guiltless of their own destitution, presses most strongly upon the law and the nation. At present they are dealt with under one of the four following plans :—

First, The children are in by far the larger number of Unions educated by a teacher under Government inspection in the house itself—the number of children of school age being in many cases very small, and the cost therefore proportionably large. Against this plan there has never been wanting a strong and righteous protest. Thus, in the Report of 1839, Mr. Tufnell, in the course of a long argument against the practice, declares, “There is considerable danger of moral contamination to the children from their residence in the same house with adult paupers. I am confident that architectural arrangements can never secure perfect classification. Conversation is carried on over walls and through windows.” He then gives other really dreadful illustrations, and concludes, “The atmosphere of a workhouse that contains adult paupers is tainted with vice; no one who regards the future happiness of the children would ever wish them to be educated within its precincts.”

The curious reader will find in the Report of 1870-71 all that can be said on the other side of the question by Mr. Bowyer and Mr. Browne, two of the inspectors. But he will not, we think, be easily convinced that the as a punishment for offences committed previous to their entrance into the workhouse. But. . . the Guardians cannot be too careful not to employ the mothers of illegitimate children in the kitchen or in domestic work generally, in which the younger and more innocent inmates of the house are engaged.”

proper place for a school is a workhouse, nor will he be able to discern how it is possible not to gain both in efficiency and economy by separating the schools from the house. The good work which, in spite of disadvantages, they accomplish now would surely be increased and not lessened by such a change.

Secondly, This arrangement is modified in an increasing number of cases (at present 160) by sending the children to some neighbouring elementary school. This is a great improvement, and does something to break the unhealthy routine of workhouse life. But it is for all that a sad sight to see the children returning from school—home.

Thirdly, The right and sensible plan is adopted of forming district schools (at present 41) for one or more large Unions, or for educating the children in a separate building. This is the rule in the Metropolis, where the district schools are removed into the country, and there are school districts for rural Unions in Surrey and Shropshire. Besides which there are some seventy Unions (most of them in the large towns) where the return states that the children are taught in a separate building.

Fourthly, Since 1870, when the Poor Law Board issued a code of regulations on the subject, Guardians have been allowed to board children out at the homes of labouring people for a sum not to exceed 4s. weekly. As the “undertakings” signed by these foster parents only amounted to 535 last year, it seems probable that a plan which cannot be defended on any sound principles of Poor Law,¹ and which might lead to serious consequences as regards parental responsibility, will not, owing to the cost and other difficulties attending it, become very general. The evidence in favour of the working of the school system is strong enough to prevent apprehension as to its results, and if removed from workhouses the schools would resemble the institutions in which so many children are educated by charity. And if the kindly feelings of the country were touched by the fact that the school is the only home that pauper children know, it would not be difficult to give them a holiday elsewhere as a reward for good conduct. It is not, however, to be supposed that improvements are not both needed and also being tried. At Birmingham, for instance, the new schools are divided into "homes" or separate cottages, built to contain thirty children each, and it is proposed to give a thorough industrial training. Meanwhile there is satisfactory evidence that even under the present indefensible system of schools in workhouses the children turn out well. In one case, out of seventy girls sent from the school, in ten years only four were known to have turned out badly, and three more to have returned to the house—this returning to the house being a direct and much to be deprecated result of the present system. This state of things, the report thinks, may be taken as typical of most workhouse schools, and, "though not one to be contented with, far removed from entire failure" (Mr. Mozley's Report for 1880).

It is seldom, we venture to think, that the conditions of an important reform are so clearly laid down as are those for one which is now being discussed. This may be called the classification of houses instead of wards in each house. The case stands thus: Setting aside the large towns, who can make their own arrangements, there are, as we have seen, a large number of workhouses scattered about in country districts, and more or less empty. To group these for, as has been proposed, each county, setting one apart for each of the various classes of inmates, and in all probability greatly decreasing the number, would be a matter of no great practical difficulty. It does not fall within our province to discuss the matter ; but if provision of a separate establishment for children could be made without further cost, it seems almost culpable to delay moving in the matter. We may remark that, owing to the suppression of some metropolitan Unions, some steps have been taken in this direction : thus the house at Poplar was set aside for able-bodied paupers of indifferent antecedents. And of course the principle is established by the provision of county asylums, into which cases of lunacy that cannot be managed in the workhouse are remitted to the amount of some 38,000, as against some 16,000 who remain in the house.

In connection with the subject of pauper children may be mentioned the present system of apprenticing, which shows the Poor Law at its best. In place of that old and melancholy drudge, the parish apprentice, boys are now sent off fairly well taught and prepared to employers who are glad to have them. Every care is taken by the regulations to secure proper treatment, and it is a duty specially cast upon the Guardians to see to the welfare of those whom they apprentice. A particularly pleasant part of the system is to be found in a circular of the Local Government Board, transmitting to the Guardians copies of the regulations for entering the Royal Navy, "their lordships having been given to understand that there are many boys in the Unions throughout the country who may be eligible and also wish to enter the service." Considering the attractions of the Royal Navy, it is probable that few have been able to avail themselves of the offer; but the spirit shown in making it, and its tendency to bridge over the gulf that divides the pauper from the citizen, by enabling the boy to defend his country instead of being maintained by it, is above praise.

There remains yet one other inmate of the workhouse, or rather of the special wards commonly attached to it, concerning whom something must be said. The regulations as to the treatment of "casual paupers" which is now the recognized title for "tramps" or "vagrants," are contained in a general order not yet ten years old (November 1871), and yet already, in the opinion of most Poor Law administrators, becoming in urgent need of alteration. Vagrants may be admitted into the casual wards by order of the relieving officer, by the master of a workhouse, or the superintendent of the ward; and in the Metropolis admission cannot be refused if the applicant is brought by a constable. The order of admission is available for one night only, and does not take effect earlier than six in the evening in winter, and eight in summer. The vagrant is searched and bathed, his clothes taken from him, and, if necessary, dried or disinfected. He is placed in a separate cell,¹ though the Central Board may as to this approve of other arrangements, and is not entitled to discharge himself before 11 A.M. the next day, and then only if he has done the task-work,—breaking stones, picking oakum, etc. etc.,—which has been assigned to him. In the event of his having become an inmate of the same ward twice in one month, he may be detained till 9 A.M. of the third day after admission. He receives 8 oz. of bread, or 6 oz. of bread and one pint of gruel or broth, for supper and breakfast.

There are not two opinions about the entire inefficacy of the above arrangements, and that for the plain and simple reason that they sin against the fundamental principle of making the relieved person's condition worse than that of the self-supporting labourer. To which may be added the want of that great Poor Law weapon of administration called classification; for it is impossible to distinguish between the honest labourer tramping in search of work (though surely these ought to be few) and the professional vagrant. To the latter the casual ward is simply an arrangement that helps him to live the rest of his life as pleases him best. The number relieved on any given day, say, for instance, January 1, 1881, when it was 6215, represents only a part (perhaps one sixth) of a much larger body, who pass like a melancholy theatrical army over the stage in different detachments. The rest of his time the habitual vagrant enjoys life in his own way. He has his pleasures, his liberty, his money, his opportunities of committing crime, and of extracting money from the bounty of a misguided public, whom no expostulation will prevent from relieving what appears at the moment to be genuine distress. In short, the vagrant is still, as he has ever been, master of the position—the scandal and standing difficulty of Poor Law administration. At the threat of mere punishment he laughs, as well knowing that it would but add force to his entreaty “for a piece of bread to save a poor fellow from having to go to jail.”

The effect of a system which is neither remedial nor repressive, but which does little more than keep vagrancy alive, upon the character of the vagrants themselves, may be easily imagined. “The effect of this is to educate and confirm the pauper in vagrant habits, to destroy his self-respect, to lessen his physical powers and moral fitness for independent labour. Neither hard fare nor imprisonment have a deterring effect upon him now, and the ‘I don’t care,’ or ‘I wish I were dead,’ betrays the condition of mind into which he has fallen. . . . His stay in the casual ward has been too short for any good influence to reach him.”¹ It is surely a very serious matter that there should be many thousands of persons in such a country as ours of whom such a description should be possible.

Some of the remedies for this distressing state of things that have been suggested are as follows:—The “Dorset system” of repressing indiscriminate almsgiving by a plan of giving bread-tickets, which has succeeded in that county; putting vagrancy under the control of the police; making habitual vagrancy a penal offence, which would imply the establishment of correctional workhouses as part of a new classification of houses. It is, however, probable that much more information, such as could be obtained only by a commission of enquiry as to their numbers, habits, and proceedings, would be required before the matter is ripe for legislation.¹

PART V.—SETTLEMENT.

Settlement arose, as we have seen, from the idea that every parish was bound to maintain its own poor, and that every person was entitled to be considered as having a settlement in some one parish, to which, if he became destitute, he was chargeable, and could be removed to it. The Reform of 1834, while taking from the separate parishes the office of administering their own relief, did not take the further and obvious step (how illogical and undecisive is English legislation at its best!) of altering the place of settlement or area of chargeability, which still remained the parish. The same principle of devolving upon localities the task of providing for whatever paupers have become legally chargeable to them still obtains; but the system has been almost revolutionized by gradual changes in the area of the localities, and in the modes of becoming chargeable to them, which we will now proceed to point out.²

¹ It must not, however, be supposed that the community is any less responsible for the existence of the vagrant than of the pauper. So long as the homes of the working classes are what the State allows them to be, we are not entitled to be surprised that so many prefer to be homeless. At present the localities where workmen MUST live are most often covered with miserable houses quite unsuited for their purpose. The working people are able and willing to pay a rent that would cover the full value of the land and of proper habitations to be built upon it, but they cannot be expected to pay the cost of destroying the houses which previous neglect has allowed to accumulate. This is the duty of the State.

² To show how strong was the old idea that the area of the

The thin edge of the wedge was indeed introduced in the Act of 1834 itself, by the formation of a common fund in each Union for the payment of what are called establishment charges—that is, the salaries of officers, building and maintenance of the workhouse, and so on. To this fund each parish contributed, not according to its rateable value, but according to its expenditure in poor relief. In 1846 some alteration in the law of settlement in the interests of the working people, who were still bound to their own parishes, was found to be necessary, and a very important Act, called the Irremovable Poor Act, was passed, by which it was provided that persons who had lived five years in one parish should not be removed from it, but become chargeable to it so long as residence was maintained. It will be observed that residence does not confer a settlement in the sense that the pauper could claim relief if he left the parish, and became chargeable elsewhere, in which case he would have to fall back upon his original earlier settlement by birth, or otherwise. The same Act also forbade the removal of widows during the first year, of children under sixteen, unless their parents are removed with them, and of cases of sickness when the sickness was not such as to cause permanent destitution. It seems almost impossible to those who are unacquainted with the phenomena of English legislation that Parliament did not perceive, what of course immediately happened, that the burden thrown upon the parishes in which the relieving locality should be small, as contrasted with the modern idea that it should be as large as possible, we may mention that large old parishes, especially in the north of England, were broken up into townships and hamlets, each with its own overseer, and liability to provide for its own paupers.

movables were residing would become a source of serious hardship. Next year, therefore, an Act was passed to remedy this injustice by throwing the cost of such irremovables upon the Union; and so the very important modification of substituting union for parochial chargeability came into existence almost by chance.

Once, however, that the principle was introduced, it spread gradually over other parts of the Poor Law system. In 1848 the relief and burial of destitute wayfarers was cast upon the common fund. In 1861 the time of residence by which a pauper might acquire the status of irremovability was diminished from five years to three, and the area was extended from one parish to the whole Union. At the same time, it was enacted that parishes should contribute to the common fund, not, as heretofore, according to their expenditure in poor relief, but according to their rateable value. And finally, in 1865, the substitution of union for parochial chargeability was completed by enacting that the cost of the whole poor relief of the Union should be charged upon the common fund, while at the same time settlement was almost virtually abolished for practical purposes by the provision that residence for one year should make a pauper chargeable to the Union where he was residing.

In 1867, and again in 1870, the Metropolis was specially dealt with. London, it must be remembered, though divided for administrative purposes into as many as thirty Unions, is practically one city, so that the division into Unions, some at the extreme of poverty, and others of wealth, operates very unfairly upon the ratepayers, who are all members of one immense community. Accordingly steps were taken which practically amounted to making London one large Union for certain special purposes. A common fund was created by contributions from the various Unions, upon which was charged the cost of district asylums for the relief of the sick and insane, dispensaries, vaccination, and other matters; while, by the later Act, indoor relief to the amount of 5d. per day was also charged upon the same fund, thereby holding out two much needed inducements—first, to extend indoor accommodation in the London houses; second, to practise economy in the giving of out-relief, which was still left to be defrayed by each Union. The financial effect of this reform may be estimated from the fact that up to 1879 Bethnal Green Union had gained £200,946, and the City of London had paid £445,720. The annual gain of the first Union is now about £20,000, and the loss of the latter about £60,000. The rest of the Unions gain or lose of course according to their rateable value.

The whole question is, however, at this moment once more re-opened. A Committee of the House of Commons in 1879 expressed a preference for the Irish system, where there is no power of removal, and reported that settlement should be disregarded except for persons landing in a destitute condition at seaport towns. They recognized that settlement operates as a test of pauperism, and also prevents burdens being thrown upon large towns, where persons would become chargeable who had no interest or permanent residence in the district. Against this they set the argument that settlement is wrong in principle, inasmuch as it impedes the circulation of labour; that hardships from unfair removals still take place; that litigation would be avoided. And they conclude, in words that must sound ominous to those who know what legislation thought and said and did not a hundred years ago, "that the question should be regarded, not merely in the supposed interest of the ratepayer, but with sympathy and care for the convenience and material advantage of the 'poor'"—(See Report of Local Government Board for 1880, p. 43.)

But before a final step is taken it will have to be seriously considered that the case of Ireland is nothing to the purpose, for in that country, if there is no settlement, so also is there no out-relief. Since indoor relief is virtually guaranteed by the State to all who, accepting the test, choose to avail themselves of it, it is of no great importance, except for convenience of administration, where the indoor pauper is relieved, or over what area he becomes chargeable. His settlement might very properly be "national," and the area of chargeability either a national common fund (as in the Metropolis), or the county and large towns. But if the consequences apprehended by the Committee came to pass, namely, that there was an undue influx of paupers into certain places, and if, following the precedents of recent legislation, the area of chargeability for out-relief was also increased because of the injustice done to these places, there is good reason for apprehending a large increase in outdoor pauperism and much laxness of administration in a sphere where laxness is already sufficiently conspicuous. Relieving authorities will vote money freely when it is not raised from their own localities, and the supervision, knowledge, and investigation so essential to any reasonable administration of out-relief would become impossible. This is but one of the many dangers, in some respects, if we bear in mind our changed social, economical, and political condition, the growing dangers, to which the existence of the Poor Law exposes the nation. In view of which it is earnestly to be hoped that "citizens" will study these very serious questions in all their bearings, historical, moral, and industrial, for themselves. It is to help them in this duty that this handbook has been planned and written, the object being to lay before the reader such facts as seemed most needed to inform his mind and guide his judgment.

CHAPTER VI.

POOR LAW STATISTICS.

No history of Poor Law would be complete that did not give some statistical account of the progress of administration under the new Act. Out of the enormous mass of figures and calculations at our disposal, there are, however, but comparatively few that are of interest to the "citizen," who is concerned only with broad and general results. We will begin with a comparative statement of the cost and extent of pauperism for every tenth year since 1834. Unfortunately the last census year is not yet available for our purpose, and the population is therefore estimated. It must be remembered that the number of paupers is the mean number between those returned as receiving relief on the 1st of January and 1st of July in each year, and does not therefore represent the total number of recipients in each year.

| Year. | Population. | Expenditure. | Per head of Pop. | Paupers. | Per cent of Pop. ¹ |
| | | | s. d. | | |
| 1834 | 14,372,000 | £6,317,255 | 8 9½ | | |
| 1841 | 15,911,757 | 4,760,929 | 5 11¾ | 1,299,048(?) | 7·5(?) |
| 1851 | 17,927,609 | 4,962,704 | 5 6½ | 941,315 | 5·3 |
| 1861 | 20,066,224 | 5,778,943 | 5 9 | 883,921 | 4·4 |
| 1871 | 22,712,266 | 7,886,724 | 6 11¼ | 1,037,360 | 4·6 |
| 1880 | 25,323,000 | 8,015,010 | 6 4 | 808,030 | 3·2 |

The results of this Table, so far as they disclose both an absolute and relative decrease in the number of paupers, may be pronounced moderately satisfactory, although the total number of paupers is still alarmingly great. Nor is the satisfaction (such as it is) sensibly abated by the increased expenditure, when we remember the far larger increase in the value of rateable property, and also that the total amount now covers large sums expended in improved methods of administration, e.g. the care of lunatics, and the cost of buildings of all sorts. The lowest rate ever reached was 2.9 in 1878, which was all the more remarkable, inasmuch as it was a reduction from 4.7 in 1870, when laxness of administration had led to very bad results.

The next Table contains the mean number of indoor, outdoor, and also able-bodied paupers for each year, and the actual number of lunatics and vagrants on the 1st of January for the same years. The enumeration of lunatics in asylums (classed as outdoor) only began in 1859, and partly accounts for the increase after that year.

| Year. | Indoor. | Outdoor. | Able-bodied. | Lunatics. | Vagrants. |
| 1841 | 192,106 | 1,109,642 | ... | ... | ... |
| 1851 | 114,367 | 826,948 | 163,124 | 14,346 | 3390 |
| 1861 | 125,866 | 758,055 | 145,776 | 32,887 | 1941 |
| 1871 | 156,430 | 880,930 | 172,460 | 48,334 | 3735 |
| 1880 | 180,817 | 627,213 | 115,785 | 61,295 | 5914 |

The first three columns display some gradual improvement, while, what is perhaps a more hopeful sign, the decrease upon the last decade shows how entirely the growth of pauperism, as shown in 1871, was due to mere culpable carelessness of administration, and how easy it is to abate the disease by proper remedies, such as discussion, conferences, and painstaking zeal, can suggest. The increased number of indoor paupers only practically means that a larger number of impotent folk have obtained a better mode of living than they could have had if they had remained outside the house, upon the supposition, that is, that they had failed from neglect or incapacity to provide for themselves. The same may be said more emphatically of the insane, though the Table points to a growth of insanity amongst us, and also to a growing inclination on the part of persons, who ought to know better, to put off the care of their insane relatives upon the State. And it is a serious question how far subventions by the State lead to laxness of administration. The increase of vagrants has been alluded to before, and demands immediate attention.

A question of great interest arises as to the local distribution of pauperism; but, unfortunately, the want of calculations based upon the census of 1881 prevents us from giving any but very general results. The next Table gives the amount of indoor and outdoor pauperism, together with the ratio of cost for 1880, in each of the eleven Poor Law districts, on January 1, 1881. The population is that of 1871, and it will be understood that the superiority of the urban and less pauperized districts will be further enhanced by the shifting of population into those districts.

| Division. | Population. | Indoor Paupers. | Outdoor. | Total. | Percentage of cost of Outdoor. |

| Metropolis . | 3,252,629 | 52,810 | 50,871 | 103,681 | 27·9 |

The general result of this Table is to show that, subject to modification from local peculiarities, e.g. of trade or character, the tendency is for those Unions who spend most in out-relief to be the most heavily burdened by pauperism. But the essential imperfection of the present system is most clearly revealed if we compare the results which obtain in different Unions, and find, as we shall do, that the proportion of paupers to population ranges from about 14 to about 75 per 1000 (i.e. more than five times as much), and also that the outdoor pauperism is in one case 4 per 1000, and in others (at any rate in one other) 71 per 1000. The Union thus honourably distinguished is, as all Poor Law authorities are aware, that of Atcham in Shropshire (including now Shrewsbury), where a long course of careful attention to the proper principles of Poor Law administration has brought pauperism down to what it might, by equal care, be brought nearly all over England,—population 45,565; indoor paupers, 426; outdoor, 196; total, 622. To this we may add that there are several instances in which, by the exercise of a little trouble, outdoor pauperism has been reduced 50 per cent¹ in a few years without causing any known or appreciable hardship. And the returns disclose the most striking variations in Unions that lie perhaps side by side, or are not distinguishable from each other in respect of population, wealth, or industrial occupation. And when we remember how deeply such variations penetrate into the lives and characters of the working classes, and into the taxation and prosperity of the district, the matter assumes a very serious aspect.

The following additional items may be interesting.

The expenditure for the year 1880 was divided thus :—

| In Maintenance. | Out-Relief. | Lunatic Asylums, etc. | Workhouse and other loans. | Salaries, etc. | Other Expenses. |
| £ 1,757,749 | £ 2,710,778 | £ 994,204 | £ 319,426 | £ 1,053,218 | £ 1,181,511 |

The officers were as follows :—clerks, 624 ; medical officers, 4030 ; masters, 651 ; relieving officers, 1,387. Of these apparently between 100 and 200 are dismissed or obliged to resign every year.

The following is a complete list of all the institutions in which indoor paupers may now be maintained. Some of them are, however, to be found only in the metropolis. Workhouse, infirmary, lunatic asylum, fever hospital, smallpox hospital, convalescent home, separate (Union) school, district school, certified school, institution for deaf and dumb or blind, training-ship. The number of children in average attendance at the workhouse (including separate) schools was 27,939 ; at the district schools, 7070 ; in the training-ship Exmouth, 214 ;—total, 35,223.

Conferences of Guardians are now held annually in many districts, and are strongly encouraged by the Central Board. To them may be attributed some part of the undoubted improvement that has taken place in the last ten years in the administration of relief.

In bringing the epitome of the history and operations of English Poor Law to a conclusion, it may be proper to indicate more precisely the questions which the course of our inquiry has suggested, as requiring the particular and immediate attention of public opinion with a view to future reforms. They are these—

I. Can anything be done to reduce pauperism by correcting the gross disparity between outdoor and indoor relief ; it being remembered that the former (a) constitutes a burden upon real property to the extent of between £3,000,000 and £4,000,000 per annum ; (b) acts as a protective duty in favour of the labourer as against the farmer, and in favour of the farmer (or landlord) as against the ratepayer ; (c) inflicts, as all protection must do, serious injury upon the labouring class, who are, in the case of the agricultural labourer, kept in a state of tutelage and dependence, and who are the first to suffer from any interference with the natural relations of labour and capital ?

II. Can anything be done to classify and arrange workhouses, so as to make them more fit for different classes of inmates, and also save expense ?

III. Can anything be done to repress vagrancy and self-inflicted pauperism by resorting to correctional discipline?

IV. Can nothing be done to remove children from pauperizing associations, even though this might lead to withdrawing them from the control of unworthy parents?

V. Can anything be done to stimulate local interest and secure supervision by an improved system of municipal government?

VI. Can anything be done to place the relations between Poor Law and Charity upon a sounder and more reasonable footing?

In discussing these serious and interesting questions, the great truth, which has come out, if possible, clearer than any other, must steadily be remembered, that State relief of the indigent is a necessary part of civilized social life, and that they mistake the conditions of the problem who regard it as a temporary episode, or as something peculiar to ourselves. Pauperism may be almost indefinitely modified, and the modes of giving relief are capable of much improvement, but the thing itself must in some shape or other ever remain: the poor we shall have always with us. Perhaps the most striking confirmation of the necessity of Poor Law is to be found in the words of one of the greatest of modern thinkers, whose opinion is all the more valuable because the subject seems at first sight far removed from the range of topics with which he usually occupied himself, and with which his name is commonly identified:—"Men are likewise overcome by liberality; chiefly those who have not wherewithal to buy the necessaries of life. But helping every one in need is far beyond the means and convenience of any private person. For a private man's wealth is no match for such a demand. Also a single man's opportunities are too narrow for him to contract friendship with all. Wherefore, providing for the poor is a duty that falls on the whole community, and has regard only to the common interest."—SPINOZA.¹

The English Citizen:

A SERIES OF SHORT BOOKS ON

HIS RIGHTS AND RESPONSIBILITIES.

THIS series is intended to meet the demand for accessible information on the ordinary conditions and the current terms of our political life. Ignorance of these not only takes from the study of history the interest which comes from a contact with practical politics, but, still worse, it unfits men for their place as intelligent citizens. With women this ignorance frequently remains throughout life; and even with intelligent men its place is taken only by a knowledge gained in a haphazard way. The affairs of business, contact with other men, the reading of newspapers, the hearing of political speeches, may give a partial acquaintance with such matters, or at least stimulate curiosity as to special points. But such partial acquaintance with the most important facts of life is not satisfactory, although it is all that the majority of men find within their reach.

There is a large and important class who possess political privileges, and who, in the exercise of these privileges, incur arduous labour, devise intricate associations, impose upon themselves a minutely organized discipline. They, it is hoped, may find in these books information more accessible, more systematic, and perhaps more reliable, than that which is to be gained from the occasional harangues of statesmen, or from the necessarily one-sided disquisitions of the press. They must be aware that it is on these harangues and on these disquisitions that their judgment, as a jury of citizens exercising the most august of functions, is sought; and no jury should be satisfied to learn facts only as taught them by the mouth of an advocate, however able and however learned he may be.

The series will deal with the details of the machinery whereby our Constitution works and the broad lines upon which it has been constructed. The volumes in it will treat of the course of legislation; of the agencies by which civil and criminal justice are administered, whether imperial or local; of the relations between the greater system of the imperial Government and the subdivisions by which local self-government is preserved alongside of it; of the electoral body, and its functions and constitution and development; of the great scheme of national income and its disbursement; of State interference with the citizen in his training, in his labour, in his trafficking, and in his home; and of the dealings of the State with that part of property which is, perforce, political—the land ; of the relation between State and Church which bulks so largely in our history, and is entwined so closely with our present organization ; and lastly, of those relations of the State that are other than domestic.

In dealing with these questions the aim will not be to give mere compendia of technical information, but to sum up as shortly and as clearly as possible the leading points, and to arrange these so as to show their relation to one another, and their general bearing on the life and the duties of the citizen. The books are not intended to interpret disputed points in Acts of Parliament, nor to refer in detail to clauses or sections of those Acts ; but to select and sum up the salient features of any branch of legislation, so as to place the ordinary citizen in possession of the main points of the law. They are intended further to show how such legislation arose, and (without going into minute historical or antiquarian details) to show how it has been the outcome of our history, how circumstances have led up to it, and what is its significance as affecting the relation between the individual and the State. Fresh light may often be thrown upon the subject by examining the resemblance, or contrast, between our arrangements and those existing elsewhere.

The following are the titles of the volumes:—
